The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 9, after the word "value," add the following words, viz. "in lands and stumpage."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, after the word "lands," insert the words "and stumpage."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 11, strike out the colon after the word "lands" and also the following words: "Provided, however, That in any case where any part of the land selected is national-forest land the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture shall first be secured with respect to such part."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, does not the gentleman from California think that we might well leave this language in the bill?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that this particular matter was discussed by the committee, and personally I thought it ought to remain in the bill. But after looking over the act that we are amending, which provides that all the selections and all the change must be made by and with the consent of the Secretary of Agriculture, I thought it might go out. But personally I would have no objection to leaving it in. It was left out because it would make the bill shorter.

Mr. MANN. It does not add very much to the length of the bill, and, if there is any possible doubt about it, it ought to remain. I read the law, and I was not certain that it was absolutely clear that the Secretary would still have the veto power over the selection of the national forests. I do not believe that we ought to permit a selection to be made in a national forest without the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. RAKER. I agree with the gentleman fully; but the act now provides that when an exchange is made it can not be done without the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture. That was stricken out solely upon the ground that it is repetition.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is safer to leave it in the bill. I have read the law through, and I think this ought to be left in the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. This bill is an amendment of a portion of an act. This amendment goes into the body of the act, and therefore must fit in the body of the act. Following this proviso is the word "or" and the numeral "2." They belong after the word "part," which precedes the proviso.

Mr. MANN. They are not in the law, but they will be when this goes in.

Mr. MONDELL. They must be in the law or the law will not mean anything, and this amendment will not mean anything. This proviso can not be inserted at this point at any event and have an amendment that fits in the statute. If it seemed advisable to put a proviso of this sort at the end of section 2, or at some other point, there might be no objection to it, but that is not necessary, as the act itself very clearly puts this entire matter in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Wyoming yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. Does not the act as it now stands so arrange it that no exchange can be made without the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. MONDELL. Very clearly.

Mr. RAKER. Then this provision would not be necessary.

Mr. MONDELL. And in any event this provision must go out at this point or the amendment is not harmonious. It does not fit into the statute.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman is entirely wrong about that. The proviso could be inserted in any part of the law. I took the trouble to read the law to which this is an amendment, and I read the law through. While I will not dispute with the gentleman or the committee that the Secretary of Agriculture would still have to approve the exchange before it was made out of a national forest, yet after reading the law and comparing this bill with it I thought there was doubt about his authority.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I would rather have it in, if there is any doubt. I want the bill in proper language, so there can be no doubt as to its being freely carried out by the department and good title pass both ways to and from the Government, and this bill will do it. That is its special purpose, and the department has been consulted to this end.

Mr. MANN. This purports to leave it absolutely to the Secretary of the Interior, as far as this proposition is concerned. I do not think it will hurt to inject this at this point in the form of a proviso.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it does not make a particle of difference to me, but if the gentleman had read the bill as carefully as I have, and had considered it as carefully as has the committee, he would agree that this proviso, put in at this point, disconnects the amendment. The proviso could be added somewhere else, if necessary, but it is not necessary, because the bill specifically provides for the exchanges under the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will not say that I read the law as carefully as the gentleman or as carefully as the committee, but I read the law through, and I doubt whether any member of the committee did.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think it ever occurred to the gentleman until it was suggested to him——

Mr. MANN. By whom?

Mr. MONDELL. That, whatever might be the propriety of the proviso, it should not be inserted at this point.

Mr. MANN. It can be properly inserted at this point. It is perfectly proper to insert it at this point, and that is the only place you can insert it in this bill.

Mr. RAKER. Then let us permit it to remain there.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended House bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FEDERAL BUILDING, HOUSTON, TEX.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 1647) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes."

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the last proviso of section 20, chapter 3916, Thirty-fourth United States Statutes at Large, "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," and which proviso reads as follows: "Provided further, That upon the completion of the building herein authorized to be constructed the Secretary of the Treasury shall proceed by due and proper advertisement, and under such regulations, conditions, and stipulations as he may prescribe, or as Congress may hereafter direct, to sell to the highest bidder the present building and site upon which it is located, in Houston, Tex., now owned by the United States Government and now used and occupied as a post office, courthouse, customhouse, and for other governmental purposes, and deposit the proceeds thereof into the Treasury of the United States," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. It seems to the Chair that while this bill is on the House Calendar, it properly belongs on the Union Calendar.

Mr. BURNETT. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk again read the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURNETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HOMESTEADS, WIND RIVER RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 16101) providing for patents to homesteads on the ceded portion of the Wind River Reservation in Wyoming.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. MONDELL (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, and that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have the bill read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the better practice is to have the bill read through, to see if anybody has any objection to its present consideration. After the bill is read the Chair will then put the gentleman's request.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all persons who prior to the passage of this act have made valid homestead entry on the ceded portion of the Wind River Reservation in Wyoming and establish residence thereon in good faith, but who through no fault of their own were unable to secure water for the irrigation of their lands, shall be granted patent for their lands upon payment of the Indian price for the land and without the necessity of proving continuous residence thereon.

With the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That any person who, prior to December 16, 1911, made homestead entry on the ceded portion of the Wind River Reservation in Wyoming, and has not abandoned the same, and who has been unable to secure water for the irrigation of the lands covered by his entry, may secure title to the same upon the submission of satisfactory proof that he has established and maintained actual bona fide residence upon his land for a period of not less than eight months and upon payment of all sums remaining due on said land as provided for by the act of March 3, 1905."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk again read the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DAM ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER, STEARNS COUNTY, MINN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 19071) granting an extension of time to the St. Cloud Electric Power Co. to construct a dam across the Mississippi River.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for the completion of the dam by the St. Cloud Electric Power Co., authorized by the act entitled "An act permitting the building of a dam across the Mississippi River between the counties of Stearns and Sherburne, in the State of Minnesota," approved June 28, 1906, is hereby extended to three years from the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That the construction, maintenance, and operation of the dam herein authorized shall be in all respects in accordance with and subject to the provisions of the act approved June 23, 1910, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters,' approved June 21, 1906."

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, on page 1, line 11, the word "herein" and insert in lieu thereof the word "therein."

On page 1, line 11, after the word "authorize," insert the words "by the aforesaid act."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

IMPORTATION AND MOVEMENT OF PLANTS, FRUITS, AND VEGETABLES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 21291) to regulate the importation of nursery stock and other plants and plant products; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain quarantine districts for plant diseases and insect pests; to permit and regulate the movement of fruits, plants, and vegetables therefrom, and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLAYTON). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say that a casual examination of the bill develops that it is a bill of exceeding importance, far-reaching in its provisions, and a step in the direction of Federal control, which grants great power to the Secretary of Agriculture, and I do not think that it is a bill to be considered under the unanimous-consent rule to-day. It is a bill carrying a large appropriation; it is a bill that, in my judgment, ought to be amended before it is passed, even if Congress has the power to enact this sort of a bill. I merely wanted to reserve the right to object so that anyone, the author of the bill, or some one else——

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. BARTLETT. In a moment. I want to state to the Chair and to the House that, so far as I am concerned, I am not satisfield to allow a bill of this character, a bill of this importance, and the vesting of this great power in the Secretary of Agriculture, to pass by unanimous consent, and while I shall reserve the right to object I will reserve it so that anyone who desires may make a statement about it, but I propose in the end to object.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I, too, desire to reserve my right to object and shall listen to the explanation of the chairman of the committee or other Members with regard to the purposes of the bill.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, let me say, when this bill is explained these gentlemen will withdraw their objection, and the gentleman of the committee who is in charge of this bill, Mr. SIMMONS, of New York, will make an explanation of the bill, to which I hope the House will give patient attention.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Massachusetts, I think it would be a useless consumption of time, and therefore I object.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he reserve his objection for a moment.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that these gentlemen are going to object, anyway, I do not like to have the time of the House taken up, and therefore I object.

Mr. LAMB. I do hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made; and, under the rule, the bill will be stricken from the calendar, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

RELIEF OF DESERT-LAND ENTRYMEN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20491) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant further extension of time within which to make proof on desert-land entries.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, grant to any entryman under the desert-land laws a further extension of the time within which he is required to make final proof: Provided, That such entryman shall, by his corroborated affidavit filed in the land office of the district where such land is located, show to the satisfaction of the Secretary that because of unavoidable delay in the construction of irrigation works intended to convey water to the land embraced in his entry he is, without fault on his part, unable to make proof of the reclamation and cultivation of said lands as required by law within the time limited therefor; but such extension shall not be granted for a period of more than three years, and this act shall not affect contests initiated for a valid existing reason.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], in charge of the bill, explain just what this does.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to do so. The desert-land law requires an entryman to clear, break, cultivate, irrigate, reclaim, and prove up on his land within four years after the date of his filing. At the time the desert-land law was originally enacted it was believed that four years would be long enough within which to require entrymen on the public domain to reclaim their land and make final proof. In those days there were large tracts of public land that could be readily cleared and easily irrigated. In many cases only short ditches were required, and their construction and the reclamation of the lands involved comparatively little expense. But practically all of those lands that were readily reclaimed and irrigated have been entered years ago. The lands that are now being taken up under the desert-land law are most of them far from the source of water supply and exceedingly difficult to irrigate. In fact, most of the land can only be irrigated by means of exceedingly expensive irrigation projects, including long canals and large reservoirs, many of which cost millions of dollars and require many years to construct. The result is that the desert-land entryman under those large projects and some under many of the smaller projects have been absolutely unable to get water to their land within the four years allowed by the original law. To relieve that situation and prevent the entrymen from losing their claims and all of their improvements, Congress passed the act of March 28, 1908 (35 Stat., 52) authorizing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to grant the entrymen an extension of three years within which to make final proof, upon making a showing to him of the good faith of the entryman and the unavoidable delays in the construction of the irrigation works. That act has been of very great benefit in protecting the rights of bona fide settlers throughout the entire West. But it has recently been clearly demonstrated that even that three years' extension beyond the four years allowed by the original law is not long enough. A year ago last month Congress passed the act of February 28, 1911, granting a further extension of time to desert-land entrymen under various irrigation projects in three counties in the State of Washington, and during the month of January, this year, in order to protect a large number of desert-land entrymen under a very extensive irrigation project in Weld and Larimer Counties, Colo., I introduced and secured the passage of the act approved January 26, 1912.

Since the passage of that act I have been appealed to by numerous other entrymen throughout the State of Colorado, as well as from other States in the West, asking why I did not make that act general instead of local, and grant relief to many other equally meritorious desert-land entrymen throughout the United States.

In compliance with those requests, and to make the law general and to allow to all desert-land entrymen an additional three years' extension beyond the seven years, where it is shown to be necessary, I introduced this bill. I presented the matter to the Secretary of the Interior personally, and then had the Public Lands Committee of the House officially refer the bill to that department for report. The Secretary recommended the passage of this general act, instead of Congress passing a large number of local relief bills, as we would otherwise undoubtedly have to do. That is what this bill is intended to accomplish.

Mr. MANN. I quite agree with the gentleman about that. Is this intended to cover any desert-land entry excepting where there is an irrigation project under construction or in view? There might be a man on land where there never was any intention of having irrigation works; and yet there would be, and he could truthfully say that there was, an unavoidable delay in the construction of irrigation works intended to convey water to his land, and certainly would be truthful about it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. This law would not apply to anybody who is not in good faith trying to get water on his land. It is intended to relieve entrymen who are unable to secure water because the reservoirs, canals, and ditches, by means of which they expect to secure water, are not completed within the time that the law requires them to show irrigation and reclamation of their lands and make final proof. Neither the Secretary of the Interior nor the Commissioner of the General Land Office has authority to grant a man an extension of time beyond the three years now authorized by law. This law will give the Secretary of the Interior permission to grant a three years' further extension and thereby relieve the entryman from having his rights forfeited with the consequent loss of all of his property and improvements and desert-land rights.

Under the desert-land laws an entryman is required to make annual proof before the land office, showing by his own affidavit and the affidavits of two witnesses that he has actually expended $1 an acre for every acre of his claim during each year, and if he can not or does not do so, his land is subject to forfeiture. A man can not say that he is or has been unavoidably delayed in the construction of irrigation works if he has not been making any substantial effort and showing good faith in that direction.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not know. There were a great many entries under the desert-land act before there were any irrigation projects.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly. There were many desert-land entries made under small ditches before any of these present-day large irrigation projects were contemplated. But these large reclamation enterprises are doing a wonderful work toward the development of the West, and many of them take from 5 to 10 years to complete.

Mr. RAKER. I understand from the bill that if four or five men go out and try to get water for their land and during the first three years should spend at the rate of a dollar an acre upon their tracts, under this bill, they having failed to get the water and having expended their money, acting in good faith as private individuals, would be able to get the extension. So they would not lose their right, whether it was under a reclamation project by a corporation, or there were only four or five men interested in the construction of the ditch by which they expected to irrigate their desert-land claims?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. This bill does not say anything about reclamation projects or any other particular kind of irrigation projects. It is intended to grant relief to all desert-land entrymen where, "because of unavoidable delay in the construction of irrigation works intended to convey water to the land embraced in his entry he is, without fault on his part, unable to make proof of the reclamation and cultivation of said lands as required by law within the time limited therefor.'

I have drafted this bill in almost the identical language of section 3 of the act of March 28, 1908 (35 Stat., 52). So that both under that act and under this bill all desert-land entrymen who can make a showing of good faith and unavoidable delay are entitled to the extension upon making proper application. Under the act of 1908 the entryman must apply to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, while under this act he must apply to the Secretary of the Interior.

The bill as recommended by the Public Lands Committee and the Secretary of the Interior, and in the form I have reported it and ask to have it passed, reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, in addition to the extension authorized by existing law, grant to any entryman under the desert-land laws a further extension of the time within which he is required to make final proof: Provided, That such entryman shall, by his corroborated affidavit filed in the land office of the district where such land is located, show to the satisfaction of the Secretary that because of unavoidable delay in the construction of irrigation works intended to convey water to the land embraced in his entry he is, without fault on his part, unable to make proof of the reclamation and cultivation of said lands as required by law within the time limited therefor; but such extension shall not be granted for a period of more than three years, and this act shall not affect contests initiated for a valid existing reason: Provided, That the total extension of the statutory period for making final proof that may be allowed in any one case under this act, and any other existing statutes of either general or local application, shall be limited to six years in the aggregate.

The report of the Department of the Interior upon the bill is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 4, 1912.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
Acting Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your request of February 22, 1912, for a report on H. R. 20491 and, in response, to submit the following:

This bill proposes to confer upon the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, in addition to extensions authorized by existing law, the authority to grant to entrymen under the desert-land acts a further extension, not exceeding three years, of the period within which final proof on their entries is required, where the entrymen show to the satisfaction of the Secretary that because of unavoidable delay in the construction of irrigation works intended to convey water to the lands embraced in their entries they are, without fault on their part, unable to comply with the requirements of the law within the time limited therefor.

The act of March 28, 1908 (35 Stat., 52), authorizes the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his discretion, to grant extensions of the time within which final proofs on desert-land entries are required to be made, not exceeding three years, upon substantially the same terms as this bill, but with the further requirement that the applicant for the benefit of the extension shall show "that he has in good faith complied with the terms, requirements, and provisions" of the desert-land acts.

By the act of February 28, 1911 (36 Stat., 960), the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to grant a further extension of the time for submitting final proof on desert-land entries in the counties of Benton, Yakima, and Klickitat, Wash.; and by the act of January 26, 1912 (public, No. 62), the same authority was given him with reference to the counties of Weld and Laramie, Colo.

The bill under consideration is couched in substantially the same terms as the two special acts above mentioned, except that it is of general, and not merely local, application. These special acts, which met with the approval of this department, were passed because, on account of the unusual magnitude of certain private irrigation projects in the counties referred to and the unavoidable delays incident to the construction of the irrigation works, some of the desert-land entrymen who depended for their water supply upon these projects were, without fault on their part, unable to comply with the law, even within the additional time which could be allowed them under the provisions of the act of March 28, 1908.

Inasmuch as similar conditions may now exist or may hereafter arise in other localities to which the special acts are not applicable, good reason exists in the opinion of this department for the enactment of a general measure which would enable the department to grant similar relief without its being necessary for the parties interested to seek special legislation.

It is suggested, however, that the bill as your committee proposes to amend it would make it possible to allow two further extensions of three years each in those localities in which additional extensions of time have been authorized under the special acts above mentfoned. The total period could thus be extended to 13 years from the date of the original entry. In view of the liberal extensions of time provided for by the general act of March 28, 1908 (35 Stat., 52), as supplemented by the provisions of this bill, it is thought that a further amendment should be offered by which the total extension of the statutory period for making final proof that may be allowed in any one case, under this bill and any other existing statutes, of either general or local application, shall be limited to six years in the aggregate. All desert-land claims would thus be placed upon an equal footing.

With such an amendment this department would recommend that the bill be enacted into law.

Very respectfully,

SAMUEL ADAMS,
Acting Secretary.

In the report of the Department of the Interior made December 18, 1911, on my bill, that was applicable only to Weld and Larimer Counties, Colo., the Secretary stated:

While unforeseen engineering difficulties have been met with, which have caused greatly increased cost of construction, which has in turn necessitated additional delay from the difficulty of raising money to finance such increased cost, it is not thought that any good reason exists for canceling entries in which the entrymen have acted in entire good faith, but have not been able, from the difficulties met with by the irrigation company, on which they must depend for water, to irrigate the lands in their entries within the time required by law.

It is therefore recommended that the provisions of this bill be enacted into law.

That is a very succinct statement of the conditions prevailing in a large number of very meritorious and extensive irrigation enterprises throughout the West. At the present time the rights of a large number of bona fide desert-land entrymen are being seriously jeopardized and threatened by reason of the approach of the time when they must make final proof, while the irrigation works from which they must get their water are not yet completed.

In view of the fact that the granting of the extension herein provided for is left entirely within the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, it is not deemed possible that there can be any fraud or imposition practiced upon the Government, or that the law can in any manner be perverted from its object. Many of the desert-land entrymen in the Western States have expended all the way from $1,000 to $10,000 each toward obtaining water for their respective lands, and have already secured the three years' extension of time now allowed under the law, and the entire seven years time is about to expire, and owing to unavoidable delays, through no fault of theirs, it will be utterly impossible for them to secure water and prove up on their claims within the time required by the existing laws. This bill simply grants the Secretary of the Interior discretionary power to extend their time three years.

There can be no doubt but what the passage of this bill will afford a just protection to many deserving settlers on the public lands and tend to the orderly development of the West, and I trust it may meet with the approval of this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, insert the words:
"In addition to the extension authorized by existing laws."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, insert the following after the word "reason": "Provided, That the total extension of the statutory period for making final proof that may be allowed in any one case under this act, and any other existing statutes of either general or local application, shall be limited to six years in the aggregate."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire whether this "six years in the aggregate," as stated in the committee amendment, is six years of extension or six years of total statutory period with the extension.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. This bill will make it possible for an entryman to secure a total extension of six years. The original law allows four years, and then the act of March 28, 1911, authorizes the Commissioner of the General Land Office to extend an entryman's time three years, and this act will hereafter allow the Secretary of the Interior to extend his time beyond that three years three years more, so that the total extensions, whether under that former act or a local statute or any other statute, shall not authorize more than six years' extension in the aggregate, which would mean 10 years from the date of his filing on his claim.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid upon the table.

EXTENSION OF PAROLE LAW.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 14925) to amend "An act to parole United States prisoners, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1910.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14925) to amend "An act to parole United States prisoners, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1910.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the "Act to parole United States prisoners, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1910, be amended so as to read as follows, to wit:

"That every prisoner who has been or may hereafter be convicted of any offense against the United States and is confined in execution of the judgment of such conviction in any United States penitentiary or prison, for a definite term or terms of over one year, or for the term of his natural life, whose record of conduct shows that he has observed the rules of such institution, and who, if sentenced for a definite term, has served one-third of the total of such term or terms for which he was sentenced, or, if sentences for the term of his natural life, has served one-third of the total of his expectancy of life at the date of his arrival at such penitentiary or prison, to be computed according to the Carlisle mortality tables, but not less than 15 years from such date, may be released on parole as hereinafter provided."

The committee amendments were read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAY). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, strike out the word "sentences" and insert in lieu thereof the word "sentenced."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out after the word "served," down to and including the words "such date" on line 10, and insert in lieu thereof the words "not less than 15 years."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. As I understand, this bill, stated a little strongly, practically abolishes life punishment.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think the gentleman overstates the case.

Mr. MANN. It does if the man obeys the rules of the prison where he is incarcerated.

Mr. CLAYTON. With the gentleman's permission, I would like to state my views as to what this bill will accomplish. It extends the benefit of the present parole law to a prisoner undergoing a life sentence. Under the law as it now stands a prisoner undergoing life sentence can not have the benefit of any parole. It matters not what facts or what consideration of mercy may exist in his case, how exemplary his conduct may have been, or what other good reason may exist, he can not be paroled.

None of these, nor all of them together, can induce the extension to him of any benefit under the parole law, because he is under life sentence, and the prison parole law does not apply to a prisoner under life sentence. Now, the present parole law provides—

That every prisoner who has been or may hereafter be convicted of any offense against the United States and is confined in execution of the judgment of such conviction in any United States penitentiary or prison for a definite term or terms of over one year, whose record of conduct shows he has observed the rules of such institution, and who has served one-third of a total of the term or terms for which he was sentenced, may be released on parole, as hereinafter provided.

Now, this law will be changed in accordance with this amended bill so that it will read as follows:

That every prisoner who has been or may hereafter be convicted of any offense against the United States and is confined in execution of the judgment of such conviction in any United States penitentiary or prison for a definite term or terms of over one year, or for the term of his natural life, whose record of conduct shows that he has observed the rules of such institution, and who, if sentenced for a definite term, has served one-third of the total of such term or terms for which he was sentenced, or, if sentenced for a term of his natural life, has served not less than 15 years, may be released on parole as hereinafter provided.

It is to bring the prisoner undergoing life sentence within the operation of this law, if his case merits such favorable consideration. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the parole board, in its report for 1911, on page 5, stated:

The parole law is limited to prisoners sentenced to definite terms. It is believed by the members of the Federal boards of parole that the law can with good reason be enlarged so as to include prisoners undergoing life sentences. The statutes in some of the States make life prisoners eligible to parole when they shall have actually served a long period of years, and some such plan is recommended for United States prisoners undergoing life sentences. There are some 200 of these prisoners, many of whom have been in prison for many years, whose record prior to conviction was not vicious, and who while in prison have never been reported for any violation of the prison rules.

And the Attorney General of the United States, in his annual report for 1911, on page 73, said on this subject:

I concur in the recommendations made by the boards of parole in their report that the law should be modified so as to include within its provisions prisoners undergoing life sentence by providing, as is done in the statutes of a number of States, that such prisoners shall be eligible to parole when they shall have actually served some long period of years. There are now upward of 200 prisoners serving life sentences in Federal penitentiaries. At present the only hope of a life prisoner, no matter how exemplary his conduct may be, lies in the exercise by the President of the power of Executive clemency. I believe it to be more to the interests of society that such prisoners should be liberated on parole, subject to the supervision and regulation which is possible under the parole law, than that they should be discharged absolutely by Executive pardon.

Now, I hope that the gentleman will not object to this measure.

Mr. MANN. It is too late to object, and I had no intention of objecting.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have never been a prosecuting attorney, or a judge, or a jury, and hence I have never had occasion to send anybody to the penitentiary. I have never been a witness in a case of that kind, and I should hate very much to have the responsibility of depriving any individual of his liberty by incarcerating him in prison or otherwise. And yet I am not entirely certain whether it is advisable to pass a law which practically provides that no person shall be sent to prison for more than 15 years. In other words, under the operation of this bill any person who is sentenced and who obeys the rules of the prison and has a record of good conduct is practically entitled to a parole, because I take it that the parole board are not treating individuals differently where the circumstances are the same.

I have doubted whether the parole law was advantageous. I know that it has been a great benefit to certain gentlemen who had violated the national banking laws and various other laws, and who were sentenced to prison for not long terms, and who came out at the end of one-third of the terms to which they were sentenced. Possibly that is a desirable thing. I know of one case where I thought it was a good thing to have that done. Yet we go ahead and pass laws that make it easier all the time for criminals to escape punishment, in the face of an increase of crime.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass? Those in favor will say "aye"; those opposed, "no."

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHEYENNE RIVER AND STANDING ROCK INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3475) extending the time of payment to certain homesteaders on the Cheyenne River Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and on the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who has heretofore made a homestead entry for land which was formerly a part of the Cheyenne River Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, or the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, authorized by the act approved May 29, 1908, may apply to the register and receiver of the land office in the district or districts in which the land is located for an extension of time within which to make payment of any amount that is about to become due, and upon the payment of interest for one year in advance, at 5 per cent per annum upon the amount due, and payment will be extended for a period of one year, and any payment so extended may annually thereafter be extended for a period of one year in the same manner: Provided, That the last payment and all other payments must be made within a period not exceeding one year after the last payment is due; that all moneys paid for interest as herein provided shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians as a part of the proceeds received for the lands.

SEC. 2. That failure to make any payment that may be due, unless the same be extended, or to make any extended payment at or before the time to which such payment has been extended as herein provided, will forfeit the entry and the same shall be canceled and any and all payments theretofore made shall be forfeited.

SEC. 3. That nothing herein contained shall affect any valid adverse claim initiated prior to the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, this is the same bill to which I objected when it was on the Unanimous Consent Calendar once before, because I thought some of the provisions in it were not specific enough to make them perfectly plain, and I then asked the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] if he would not take those matters into consideration. I should like to inquire of him whether he has done so.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois I will say that I have an amendment to the amendment that I expect to offer, if unanimous consent is granted, which makes it entirely clear that in order to have the benefits of an extension if an entryman submits proof that he must apply for an extension and pay interest at 5 per cent in advance, the same as required if entrymen want an extension and do not offer proof. Since the bill was objected to when it was considered upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar upon the 22d of February, I sent it to the Secretary of the Interior, calling attention to the debate when the objection was made, and requested an expression of his views as to the amendment. I have received a letter in which he says he does not think it ought to be enacted. Of course I do not agree with his opinion and believe, in view of the fact that unless there is some provision of this kind enacted, that the settlers will not only abandon the lands but the Indian will lose the sale at the price that will have to be paid in order to acquire title under the terms of the law under which the entries were made, and I have two purposes in view in trying to secure this legislation. The first, to enable the settler to acquire title to his land and save what he has already paid, and also to give the Indian the benefit of a higher price than will be received if the lands are abandoned and have to be later reappraised and disposed of to other settlers. As I stated when the bill was up before, the law provides that the proceeds from the sale of these lands be placed in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians and draw 3 per cent per annum, while by the terms of this bill the deferred payments will bear 5 per cent interest, which must be paid in advance, and there is an advantage to the Indian to have the bill enacted into law. For the information of the House I will submit the letter of the Acting Secretary of the Interior in which he comments upon the proposed amendment and states that in his opinion it ought not to be enacted:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 8, 1912.

Hon. CHARES H. BURKE,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 23d instant, requesting an expression of opinion with reference to S. 3475 and suggested amendment thereto.

The bill proposes to grant an extension of time for payments on lands within the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Reservations, in North and South Dakota, and the proposed amendment thereto to allow commutation proof to be submitted on entries therein, patent to be withheld until full and final payment of the purchase price is made.

The act of May 29, 1908 (35 Stat., 460), authorizing the disposition of these lands, provides for the classification and appraisement thereof and their subsequent disposition under the homestead and town-site laws of the United States, the appraised price of the lands to be paid in six equal annual installments. Section 4 of the act further provides that homestead entries made might be commuted under section 2301, Revised Statutes, upon payment of the entire appraised price, which amount under the law is required to be deposited to the credit of the Indians. The provision of commutation imposes no additional price as a prerequisite for commutation, nor does the proposed amendment to S. 3475. Therefore, if S. 3475 as amended be enacted into law, entrymen will be relieved of the necessity of residence upon, cultivation, and improvement of their lands after the expiration of 14 months of such residence, improvement, and cultivation without payment of the appraised price prior to commutation and without payment of any additional sum to the United States for the commutation privilege.

This department, in view of the drought and other climatical and physical difficulties with which settlers have been required to contend, favors the modification of the act of May 29, 1908, supra, so as to extend the time within which payment of the several installments of the appraised price may be had. It does not, however, favor the proposed amendment, which would relieve entrymen from further residence upon, cultivation, and improvement of the land after they have made commutation proof of 14 months' residence, improvement, and cultivation. This provision would relieve the entrymen from conditions imposed by the original act without benefit to the Indians or to the United States while defeating in whole or in part the primary purpose of the homestead law, which is to secure the making of permanent homes on the public domain and the resultant cultivation and improvement of the land. The department, therefore, is of the opinion that the proposed addition to the bill, lines 13 to 20, inclusive, should not be made.

Very respectfully,

SAMUEL ADAMS, Acting Secretary.

Mr. MANN. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The committee amendments come first. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "due," strike out "and" and insert "such."

The amendment was agreed to.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 2, line 6, after the word "payment," strike out the words "is due" and insert "becomes due by the terms of the act under which the entry was made."

The amendment was agreed to.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 2, line 9, after the word "lands," add:

"And provided further, That any entryman who has resided upon and cultivated the land embraced in his entry for the period of time required by law in order to make commutation proof, may make proof, and if the same is approved further residence and cultivation will not be required, but patent shall be withheld until full and final payment of the purchase price is made in accordance with the provisions hereof."

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk as an amendment to the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

"Provided, That any and all payments must be made when due, unless the entryman applies for an extension and pays interest at 5 per cent per annum in advance upon the amount due, as herein provided."

Also, strike out the word "but" and insert the word "and."

Mr. MANN. There are two words "required" in the amendment. After which one does the amendment to the amendment come in?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. On page 2, line 18.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INDIAN ALLOTMENTS DISPOSED OF BY WILL.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 1332) regulating Indian allotments disposed of by will.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the approval of any will executed in accordance with section 2 of an act entitled "An act to provide for determining the heirs of deceased Indians, for the disposition and sale of allotments of deceased Indians, for the leasing of allotments, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1910, and the death of the testator, the allotment of the decedent shall continue to be subject to the restrictions contained in the trust patent: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, remove the restrictions and cause patent in fee to be issued to the person or persons to whom the land is devised.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I suggest that the proposed amendment be read.

The SPEAKER. The first thing to find out is whether unanimous consent is given for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to have the substitute read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That section 2 of an act entitled 'An act to provide for determining the heirs of deceased Indians, for the disposition and sale of allotments of deceased Indians, for the leasing of allotments, and for other purposes,' approved June 25, 1910, be amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 2. That any persons of the age of 21 years having any right, title, or interest in any allotment or individual Indian moneys or other property held in trust by the United States shall have the right prior to the expiration of the trust or restrictive period, and before the issuance of a fee simple patent or the removal of restrictions, to dispose of such property by will, in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, however, That no will so executed shall be valid or have any force or effect unless and until it shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may approve or disapprove the will either before or after the death of the testator, and in case where a will has been approved and it is subsequently discovered that there has been fraud in connection with the execution or procurement of the will the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized within one year after the death of the testator to cancel the approval of the will, and the property of the testator shall thereupon descend or be distributed in accordance with the laws of the State wherein the property is located: Provided further, That the approval of the will and the death of the testator shall not operate to terminate the trust or restrictive period, but the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, cause the lands to be sold and the money derived therefrom, or so much thereof as may be necessary, used for the benefit of the heir or heirs entitled thereto, remove the restrictions, or cause patent in fee to be issued to the devisee or devisees, and pay the moneys to the legatee or legatees either in whole or in part from time to time as he may deem advisable, or use it for their benefit: Provided also, That sections 1 and 2 of this act shall not apply to the Five Civilized Tribes or the Osage Indians.'"

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill and the amendment.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The bill has just been read. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that this reading be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the additional reading of this bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. MANN. The amendment has just been read, and I ask unanimous consent that the reading be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the reading of the substitute be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, in connection with Senate bill 3475, which we disposed of a little while ago, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DIVISION OF LANDS AND FUNDS OF OSAGE NATION OF INDIANS IN OKLAHOMA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2) supplementary to and amendatory of the act entitled "An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Nation of Indians in Oklahoma,' approved June 28, 1906, and for other purposes."

The Clerk began to read the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the bill which the Clerk is now reading is somewhat lengthy and has a number of controverted matters in it which ought to be considered, I think, in Committee of the Whole. I think I shall have to object. I am perfectly willing to reserve my objection if the gentleman from Texas wishes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Indian Affairs, through a subcommittee, has thoroughly investigated this bill. It has been gone over very carefully by the department. The affairs of this tribe of Indians are in a mixed condition. This legislation is necessary, and the sooner we get it through the sooner we will untangle the tangled skein and relieve these Indians.

Mr. MANN. I notice at one place in the bill it says that "the lands shall be paid over to the heirs." Now, there are various other provisions of a similar nature in the bill that, of course, ought to be corrected.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is an easy matter to amend those things in the bill.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how you can pay land over to heirs. The gentleman's committee is going to be called very soon.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I hope so.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois object?

Mr. MANN. I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

EXCHANGE OF CERTAIN COAL LANDS, CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW NATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3686) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to permit the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Coal Co. and the Eastern Coal & Mining Co. to exchange certain lands embraced within their existing coal leases in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nation for other lands within said nation.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. AKIN of New York. I object.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I think if the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] will investigate this bill closely he will see that there is nothing wrong about it, and that it should become a law. It only permits the coal company to exchange a lot of 360 acres of land, on which they have spent a large sum of money in boring and prospecting to ascertain if there was merchantable coal to be found under it, and finding no coal under it they want to exchange it for land that has coal under it; and this bill permits this coal company to surrender their lease and lease 360 acres elsewhere in lieu of the 360 acres surrendered. The Indians get a royalty of 8 cents per ton from the coal; and the gentleman, by preventing the passage of this bill, will be compelling this company to suspend operations and throw their miners out of employment and prevent the Indians from getting their royalty on this coal land; and they now have large slopes and shafts that will fill with water, and as the lands that they desire to lease adjoin their works the water in the slopes and shafts will percolate through the coal. The gentleman from New York, by his objection, will be injuring the Indians and injuring the company, and the passage of this bill is a matter of pressing necessity. The bill has heretofore passed this House and the Senate and is urgently recommended by the department and is asked for by the Indians themselves, and I can not conceive any valid objection to its passage.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the bill passed in the last Congress.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It passed both Houses in the last Congress without objection, but did not get to the President in time to be signed.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I have not had time to examine into the bill fully.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But the bill has been examined thoroughly by the committees of both the Senate and House and unanimously recommended by both.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I will reserve my right to object, if the gentleman wishes. It looks to me as if the company had got a lemon in the first place, and now they are going to let loose the lemon. I have not looked into the bill, but the gentleman can get it up again in a couple of weeks.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think there is no question about the urgent necessity for the passage of this bill, and it is one that has passed both the Senate and the House at the last session of Congress, but it passed too late in the session to become a law.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York withdraw his objection?

Mr. AKIN of New York. No, sir; I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 20111, the fortification appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman ought to wait until we are through with Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am necessarily engaged in the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations, and this will only take a minute.

Mr. MANN. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the fortification appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. RAUCH, and Mr. GOOD.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the next bill, H. R. 14667.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to withdraw the next bill, H. R. 14667. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, let us have an understanding as to what this does.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will ask unanimous consent that it be passed without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, that would leave it on the calendar for next unanimous-consent day.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN. I shall not object, although I do not desire anyone to refer to it as a precedent if I do object hereafter, because I do not believe in it as a matter of general practice.

The SPEAKER. The Chair quite agrees with the gentleman from Illinois. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENDING TIME OF PAYMENTS, HOMESTEADERS COEUR D'ALENE INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 18661) to provide for an extension of time of payment of all unpaid payments due from homesteaders on the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation, as provided for under an act of Congress approved June 21, 1906.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time within which all unpaid payments which have heretofore, or may hereafter, become due and payable under the provisions of the act opening the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation to settlement, approved June 21, 1906 (34 Stat. at Large, p. 336), except the cash payment required at time of entry, be, and the same is hereby, postponed and extended for two years from the date on which such payments are now by law required to be made: Provided, That any payment not made within the time required by the act above stated, and extended by the provisions of this act, shall draw interest at 5 per cent per annum, and the interest, when paid, shall be credited to the proceeds of the sale of the land, as provided in said act: Provided further, That said extension shall be subject to a full compliance by the entryman with all requirements of the homestead laws as to residence and improvements.

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That any person who has heretofore made a homestead entry for land which was formerly a part of the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation, in the State of Idaho, authorized by the act approved June 21, 1906, may apply to the register and receiver of the land office in the district or districts in which the land is located for an extension of time within which to make payment of any amount that is about to become due, and upon the payment of interest for one year in advance, at 5 per cent per annum upon the amount due, such payment will be extended for a period of one year, and any payment so extended may annually thereafter be extended for a period of one year in the same manner: Provided, That the last payment and all other payments must be made within a period not exceeding one year after the last payment becomes due by the terms of the act under which the entry was made; that all moneys paid for interest as herein provided shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians as a part of the proceeds received for the lands.

"SEC. 2. That failure to make any payment that may be due, unless the same be extended, or to make any extended payment at or before the time to which such payment has been extended as herein provided, will forfeit the entry and the same shall be canceled, and any and all payments theretofore made shall be forfeited.

"SEC. 3. That nothing herein contained shall affect any valid adverse claim initiated prior to the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know the necessity for the extension of the time of payments on these particular lands.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, the language of the bill is practically identical with the language of the bill that we have just passed affecting certain lands in the State of South Dakota, and with respect to these particular lands I would say that the law is as severe touching one who may not make his payment when it becomes due as it could well be, because the failure to make a payment causes him to forfeit his land absolutely. The necessity for the passage of this act arises from the fact that the amount to be paid by the settlers for each quarter section is from about $800 to $1,100 and more, to be made in five equal annual payments, and it is pressing the homesteader to the limit to comply with the ordinary provisions of the homestead law with respect to improvements, with respect to cultivation, and with respect to maintaining even the comforts of life within the family, not taking into account the necessity for meeting these payments.

Mr. MONDELL. What are the annual payments?

Mr. FRENCH. As I say, the annual payments will be approximately one-fifth of the entire amount for each quarter section—that is, one-fifth of from $800 to $1,100 or $1,200.

Mr. MONDELL. But this is a good country and they have been raising good crops.

Mr. FRENCH. It is a good country, but the Indians have the best lands. The lands of the settlers are not so good and many settlers are having a hard time to meet their payments because of the rough character of the land and the necessity for clearing it before cultivation. It is true the land in question is in the rainfall belt, but it is difficult and expensive to clear away trees or brush and bring the land under the plow in such area as will make it raise sufficient crops to meet the payments necessary and carry out the other requirements of the law.

Mr. MONDELL. How long extension does this provide for?

Mr. FRENCH. For a year's extension beyond the date of final payment. I asked for two years, but the committee cut it to one, in view of the great opposition. Last year a thousand acres of land were forfeited because settlers were not able to meet their payments. This year there are many others who will lose their lands and their former payments or be seriously embarrassed unless this extension be granted to them.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman knows we have many reclamation projects where it is very, very difficult for the settlers to meet their payments. Eventually these payments must be met. There ought to be some very good reason, indeed, if we are to continue from year to year, indefinitely, extensions of these payments. In the State of South Dakota it has been so dry that the grass has not grown, much less the crops. Of course, it is impossible for men under those conditions to meet payments, but this land is in a beautiful, well-watered territory—none finer in the Northwest than those lands of the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation.

Mr. NORRIS. The law requires the entire payment to be made in five years?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; and the failure to meet even one payment forfeits the entry, and former payments can not be recovered.

Mr. NORRIS. And in addition to that they have to make the necessary improvements on the land?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; and the best land was allotted to the Indians. These are the poorer, rougher lands.

Mr. MONDELL. Is this the only extension asked for?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that this is a harsh requirement in the law when taken into consideration with the improvements they have to make under the homestead law.

Mr. FRENCH. They have already made a couple of payments.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me the time asked is very short.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. All of the interest and the full amount of the principal must be paid within 12 months of the time the amount falls due.

Mr. MONDELL. It must be unless we extend the time again.

Mr. MANN. Whose fault was it that the time was made so short?

Mr. NORRIS. It was not the settlers' fault.

Mr. FRENCH. As has been suggested, it was not the fault of the settlers, and the bill was made into final shape after it had been in committees of House and Senate and after it had been in conference between the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate, and the present law represents the result of the best judgment of the Congress at that time.

Mr. MANN. It represents the result of the best judgment of the Committee on Indian Affairs, the gentleman means. Are not all people entitled to know in advance the terms upon which they can acquire this land?

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, undoubtedly, and they did know, and these people were willing to take the chance.

Mr. MANN. These people took the lands, and other people who knew the terms and thought they could not comply with them did not take the land?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And these people, having taken this land, which is valuable, they want to have their time extended. The gentleman, of course, is familiar with the fact that the department has reported against the passage of the bill; that the local land officer said it ought not to pass; and that there is no occasion for its passage. What excuse does the gentleman offer for the passage of this bill any more than the passage of any other bill which will say that one need not pay for the land?

Mr. FRENCH. I have seen no report from the department that is adverse. On the other hand, the department advises that it does not know of any reason for its passage, but that is the extent to which the department has gone in the matter of an adverse report.

Mr. MANN. That depends on how you construe the language. The department says:

On February 7, 1912, the receiver of the United States land office at Cœur d'Alene informed the Commissioner of the General Land Office that he knew of no unusual conditions which would justify the passage of this bill, and in the absence of such conditions I can not recommend its enactment.

I would call that an adverse report. The gentleman may construe it differently.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I would repeat what I have already said, that the department simply was not advised of any reasons why the bill should pass. I know, however, that the settlers are facing the payment that is due in less than six weeks—on the 1st of May—and that the failure to pass this bill will result in tremendous hardship being worked upon many settlers, and several of them will undoubtedly lose their lands, forfeiting the payments they have already made, unless we do give them this relief. They are going to pay interest on the deferred payments in any event. Here is a case in which the Indians will be benefited as well as the settlers. Upon the moneys that may be deposited in the Treasury of the United States the Indians will receive 3 per cent interest. In this bill we provide that any deferred payments shall net the Indians 5 per cent, and that the interest shall be paid in advance. The security is ample, because it is much better than before the first payment was made, and, in addition to that, the second payment has been met, and improvements are continually being made upon the land.

Mr. Speaker, in further reply, in a general way, to the opposition to this bill, I want to say that the law providing for the opening up of the Coeur d'Alene lands for settlement gave the same opportunity for the citizens of every State of this Union as was given to the people of the State of Idaho, and most of the people who made homestead entry as a result of being fortunate enough to draw a lucky number came not from my own State but from the other States of our country.

It is true that they should have been familiar in a general way with the provisions of the law before selecting their land, and I have no doubt they were, but they could not foresee the many items of expense for clearing land, building houses and fences and barns, maintaining a family, and providing for bringing the homestead into such shape as would make it able to produce a sufficient amount of revenue to meet the necessary expenses of life, together with all the improvements to be made, and, in addition thereto, meet the annual payments required under the terms of the bill.

I wish there were a provision in the present law to the effect that the Secretary of the Interior could grant an extension of time in all cases where necessary, and I hope that a majority of the settlers upon the Coeur d'Alene Reservation will not need to avail themselves of the privilege of the pending measure.

Many of these settlers were poor men, and in view of the fact that the law under which they entered these lands makes no provision for an extension of time if a single payment shall not be met, I submit to this House that it is due these settlers that an extension of time be granted.

The Government will not lose. The Indians will not lose. On the other hand, they will gain 2 per cent on deferred payments annually over the amount that is paid on Indian funds held in the Treasury of the United States; and, in addition to this, the poor settler, wherever he may be located upon the Coeur d'Alene Reservation, will be able to save his home, continue his improvements, and take on new courage as he looks into future years. It is for these people that I plead.

I take it for granted that other members of Congress who have pressed special legislation for the relief of settlers similarly located knew the conditions of the settlers concerned, and I want to assure this House that it is the severe conditions which confront many of the settlers on the Coeur d'Alene Reservation that make me urge the passage of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object at this time to the consideration of this bill, but I think I shall hereafter when such bills come up, not because I have any objection whatever to the extension of the time in which the settlers may meet their payments, but because I think that everybody in the United States is entitled to know in advance, on equal terms, with reference to obtaining the public lands. We pass a law here that comes out of one of the committees and provide that Indian or other lands can be sold on certain terms, usually Indian lands, and then people out West usually take up the lands. The people of my town, many of them, would like to go out there if they considered the payments were not onerous, but they do not go because they think the law is passed in good faith and will be enforced. And then when the time comes to make payment representatives from out there come and say the people are poor and can not pay and get the time extended. It is not fair to the people who think they can not make the entries because they think they can not make the payments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object to the passage of this bill, but I do want to make a suggestion in regard to it. There ought to be no question about the extension of time of payment, particularly when the entryman pays interest on the deferred payment, where there are conditions, climatic or otherwise, which clearly make it impossible or difficult for the entrymen to make their payments. But because the Committee on Indian Affairs reports a bill where conditions are clearly such as to justify the deferring of payment, it does not follow that every gentleman who has an Indian reservation in his State shall feel called upon to have an extension of time granted to the people on the reservation in his State. I make these remarks somewhat for the protection of gentlemen who come from regions where there are people paying for lands on Indian reservations. Every time gentlemen allow an extension of payment, where such extension is not made necessary by some unusual conditions, they are simply laying up trouble for themselves. Does the gentleman imagine he will not have the same demand the next year in this beautiful Coeur d'Alene country for an extension that he has this year? If a provision were brought in here under which the Secretary would have discretion to save deserving people who were found in a condition where it was impossible for them to make payment and there was danger of their losing their land, that is one proposition that would not be objected to; but the gentleman knows the storekeeper, the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker of Coeur d'Alene and the adjacent country are anxious to retain all of the loose change that there is in that country, in that vicinity, and do not want any of it sent to Washington, and they will delay the sending as long as they can, and that will make trouble for the gentleman from Idaho——

Mr. MANN. And the rest of us, because we will have a dozen of these bills—20 or more—within the next year.

Mr. MONDELL. I simply make these observations because we have these problems to face, those of us who live in the West, as does all the House, and I think the committee should be very careful that when an extension of payment is allowed that there are clearly conditions that make it necessary, and that where such conditions do not exist but there are well-meaning people, people who are making an honest effort—a few exceptions here and there—who can not make their payments, then some provision might be made with respect to extending their time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware that some of these settlers have lost their lands, lost the improvements and everything, lost their homes?

Mr. MONDELL. I should regret that very much, but the gentleman also knows this, that wherever you go on a reclamation project or Indian reservation there will be some people taking a chance who do not make good. Now, that is unfortunate; the gentleman understands human nature just as well as I do. I am sorry that any of these people lost their lands and I will be glad to join in an effort to restore them to them, but I think it is very important that we should know when we make general extensions that they are necessary under conditions there existing. There is no question in the Dakota case. Everybody who knows anything about conditions knows that those men, unless they had accumulations, could not possibly make their payments under the conditions there existing, and I assume times are hard in the Coeur d'Alene, but it is a country highly cultivated and of well-watered rich lands, and unless the people who went there are particularly hard up I am inclined to think there are a few dollars lying around in the Coeur d'Alene country that could be used to make these payments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] if he will yield to me for a minute or two.

Mr. FRENCH. I will ask that the reading of the bill be dispensed with inasmuch as the bill and amendments have already been read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not yet put the other question. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Now, the gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill and the substitute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Idaho yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I will yield.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Idaho can not yield.

The SPEAKER. Any gentleman is entitled to the floor, who can get it, for five minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. Are we reading the bill under the five-minute rule?

Mr. FRENCH. That has been dispensed with.

Mr. NORRIS. If we are not reading the bill under the five-minute rule, I do not understand we are entitled to that.

The SPEAKER. When the bill is considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole there is no general debate, and it is read under the five-minute rule for amendment. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] asks to dispense with the usual proceeding of reading the whole bill at first.

The Clerk will now read it for amendment, and, if no other gentleman secures the floor first, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] as soon as the Clerk reads to a place in the bill where the gentleman can demand recognition.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That any person who has heretofore made a homestead entry for land which was formerly a part of the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation, in the State of Idaho, authorized by the act approved June 21, 1906, may apply to the register and receiver of the land office in the district or districts in which the land is located for an extension of time within which to make payment of any amount that is about to become due, and upon the payment of interest for one year in advance, at 5 per cent per annum upon the amount due, such payment will be extended for a period of one year, and any payment so extended may annually thereafter be extended for a period of one year in the same manner: Provided, That the last payment and all other payments must be made within a period not exceeding one year after the last payment becomes due by the terms of the act under which the entry was made; that all moneys paid for interest as herein provided shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians as a part of the proceeds received for the lands.

"SEC. 2. That failure to make any payment that may be due, unless the same be extended, or to make any extended payment at or before the time to which such payment has been extended as herein provided, will forfeit the entry and the same shall be canceled, and any and all payments theretofore made shall be forfeited.

"SEC. 3. That nothing herein contained shall affect any valid adverse claim initiated prior to the passage of this act."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. It seems to me that while there is a great deal in what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said in regard to these extensions that come up more or less frequently, after all the greatest mistake is made in the beginning by Congress in not giving a sufficient time and fixing a time sufficiently far distant so that a man in ordinary circumstances can go on to the land and be able to meet the payments which are provided by law. I believe the fault is with us. We have here a provision of the law where we have provided that the land shall be paid for in five years. We also recognize the fact that the man who buys it and goes onto a piece of raw land, must build himself a house, he must build barns, and he must subdue this wild land. And, as the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] says, in this particular case he has to clear a good deal of it.

Yet we have, under the terms of the law, demanded that he shall do all of this and meet all the payments, complete, within five years from the beginning. There is not one case out of a hundred where a man goes onto a farm which he buys, especially where there is nothing on the land—no house, no barn, no home, no cultivation—where he is able to pay for it in five years. As a matter of fact, nobody loses anything if this extension is made.

The Indians who get the money get a larger per cent of interest than they would if the man paid promptly. The provision is made for the payment of 5 per cent interest. There is no danger of loss, because one payment is already made, the improvements have been made on these lands, and the security is a great deal more valuable now than it was in the beginning. So the fault, in my judgment, if there is one—and I am inclined to think there is—in all these cases is with Congress and not with the settler. We have passed these laws, ostensibly at least, for the poor man. The man who is not poor does not care to go into this kind of a new country and take up these lands. It is an invitation that Congress sends all over the country to the men who are poor and who want to go into this country and build for themselves homes. And we have surrounded them with such exactions that it is almost impossible for poor men to do this. So that while it may indirectly not be fair to the man who did not take the risk we would be in rather an embarrassing position with the Indians if nobody had taken the risk and had gone there and purchased these lands. It seems to me instead of shutting down entirely we ought to let this be a lesson to us, so that in the future we will be more lenient in the extension of time for the honest homesteader who is honestly trying to redeem that country and make a home for himself.

Something has been said about the reclamation project. Mr. Speaker, everybody now concedes it was one of the best things that was ever devised for the country, and particularly for the West, and yet there are hardships right along this line, where we provided that the man who takes the land under the reclamation project has to pay too much too soon. It precludes the poor man from going in and redeeming the land.

We require him to pay one-tenth of it within a year, before it is possible for him to raise anything on the land. We fail to recognize that it is raw land. There are no improvements there. A man must have a sufficient amount of money when he takes one of these projects to live for a year or two, at least, without any return. So that the only kind of people who are able to go into these kinds of projects are those who are so well fixed that they do not care to go into them. It is the poor man who would be glad to go in if you would make the inducement such that it would be possible for him to make a living while he was redeeming this wild country and making it into such a one as we expect and demand in the law that he shall make it. Particularly in this case, as presented by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], it seems to me an instance where we can well afford to correct the error that we failed to correct when we framed the original law, and that means no loss to anybody, and no loss in equity to the Indians, who would get the money. The Indian would get a larger rate, and more of it, and it only extends it one year. It seems to me that the bill is very fair and the request is very reasonable, and that it ought not to excite any opposition whatever.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard on the amendment. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] criticizes the Committee on Indian Affairs for having reported this bill. That same committee, at the meeting before the one when this bill was reported, reported a bill introduced by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], with relation to settlers upon the Shoshone or Wind River Reservation in Wyoming.

That bill passed the House by unanimous consent to-day. Under the terms of the law by which the settlers upon that reservation in Wyoming went upon the lands they were required to pay 50 cents an acre when they made their entries and the balance in equal annual payments, I think, during a period of four or five years. They may commute if they have resided upon their land for a period of 14 months. The bill which passed the House to-day, which was reported by this committee, provided that those settlers, if they showed a residence of not less than eight months, might commute and acquire title by paying the balance due for their lands.

Now, I say, Mr. Speaker, that that bill was proper. It was right to enact it. It is true that in that case it was shown that great drought prevailed, and that probably it would be impossible for all of those settlers to acquire title to their lands if they were required to observe strictly the law under which their entries had been made.

In the case of this bill the Committee on Indian Affairs, after a full consideration of the measure, believed that unless we did enact some remedial legislation many of the settlers would be unable to acquire title to the land or comply with the law and thereby lose their only home; and therefore we unanimously reported this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with what the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has said, that this legislation ought not to be passed unless there is a condition of affairs by which a great hardship will be imposed upon the settlers, unless they are granted relief. In this case, under existing law, these payments are to be made in one or two or three or four or five years, as I remember. The payments do not draw any interest whatever if they are paid as they become due; when paid the money is placed in the Treasury and draws interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum. Under the terms of this bill, if the settler is unable to meet his payments, he must make an application for an extension and pay interest at 5 per cent in advance.

Now, there is no injustice done by this proposition to the Indians. On the contrary, it operates to his benefit. And, furthermore, I may say that many of these settlers could undoubtedly acquire title to their lands and make payments by going to the money lenders and paying a high rate of interest and mortgaging their lands. This proposition simply enables the settler to borrow the money of the Indian and pay him 5 per cent interest in advance instead of the Indian getting only 3 per cent if it goes into the Treasury; and therefore I say that from every standpoint the action of the committee is not only justified, but there is no occasion for criticism of the committee in having reported this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to say anything more about this bill, but the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] has referred as a matter of comparison to a bill which I introduced and which was passed by the House to-day.

That bill was entirely dissimilar in all its provisions from this. The only thing that bill did was to provide that the homestead entryman, instead of being compelled to show that he had remained upon his homestead 14 months, would be compelled to show that he had remained upon his homestead eight months continuously; and the fact is that three-quarters of the homesteaders affected by that bill have been on their homesteads not only eight months, but a good portion of the time for the last four years. But the department held that if a man were on his homestead all summer and left for two or three months during the winter and came back and spent the next summer on his homestead and was away again two or three months during the winter following, there was a break in the continuity of his settlement, and he could not prove up.

Some of these men have actually lived upon their lands from two and one-half to three years, if the time could all be added together, and we did not relieve them from the payment of a penny.

Now, I have no objection to this legislation if it is necessary. I would be the last man in the House to object to granting relief to homestead settlers who need relief. I will not say that these men do not need relief. I will only say that, in my judgment, it has not been proven that they do. I say it is important in the future that in passing upon cases of this kind it should be very clearly shown that the relief asked for is necessary, because you can depend upon it that relief will be asked for, whether it is necessary or not, and it is important for the committee to examine into these matters and decide whether their relief is absolutely necessary. I shall take it for granted in this case that it is. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I agree with practically everything, if not everything, that was said on this subject by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. My objection to bills of this character which come before the House is the objection to special privilege.

We hear a great deal said in the country about legislation in favor of special privilege. That is precisely what this bill is, and that was precisely what the bill was that was reported from the committee and introduced by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who has criticized this bill. He has made a very valuable criticism against this bill, and a similar, though not exactly the same, criticism could have been made and ought to have been made against his bill. Special privilege is granted to people to go upon this land under certain terms offered by the Government, when other people are deterred from going on the land because they think they can not comply with those terms.

A few weeks ago we had a bill up for consideration here in reference to the disposition of Indian lands in Oklahoma, and I got inserted in the bill a provision giving to the Secretary of the Interior discretion in reference to the time of extending payment. I would like to inquire if any gentleman in the House knows what has become of that bill and that proposition?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer the gentleman's inquiry, that the question of making this extension discretionary with a department of the Government was considered quite carefully by the Committee on Indian Affairs. It was thought that practically all of these people—I am speaking generally now—that asked for these extension acts would be seeking relief, and that to make it discretionary with a department of the Government would necessitate the entryman making an application. In most instances he would be required to employ an attorney, and he would thereby be put to an expense, and it was thought that it would be much better, if we were going to grant an extension, to give the extension to everybody, so that they could all have it if they desired, and without any particular effort on their part except to comply with the condition imposed.

Mr. MANN. I do not agree with the gentleman at all, but what became of that bill with that provision in it?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I did not hear the gentleman's particular reference.

Mr. MANN. We inserted that provision in the general bill that was passed here recently in reference to the disposition of certain Indian lands in Oklahoma.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Providing for discretionary power?

Mr. MANN. The surface-land bill.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That he might grant extensions?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not recall it.

Mr. MANN. What has become of the bill? Is it still pending?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think the bill is a law. If it is the bill for the sale of the segregated lands in Oklahoma, it was a Senate bill, and the Senate concurred in the House amendment.

Mr. MANN. I am glad if it is a law. Now, we are talking here every day about special privileges, yet we bring up here a bill for the benefit of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] far more extensive in its terms than was recommended by the Interior Department; a bill authorizing the granting of patents to those people, I believe, without even cultivating a single acre of the land. Next, we come up and propose to extend the time for payment for land, where most of the people ought to be able to pay for the land, on the theory that you can sell land and have everybody comply with the terms of sale. That never has been done and never will be done. God did not make men that way any more than he made all apples the same size, the same color, and the same taste.

The SPEAKER. Debate on this amendment is exhausted. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] withdraws his pro forma amendment, and the question is on agreeing to the committee substitute for the bill.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I desire here to insert as a part of my remarks the bill as amended, so that the settlers upon the reservation may understand the provisions of the same.

The bill as amended reads as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18661) to provide for an extension of time of payment of all unpaid payments due from homesteaders on the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation, as provided for under an act of Congress approved June 21, 1906.

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who has heretofore made a homestead entry for land which was formerly a part of the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation, in the State of Idaho, authorized by the act approved June 21, 1906, may apply to the register and receiver of the land office in the district or districts in which the land is located for an extension of time within which to make payment of any amount that is about to become due, and upon the payment of interest for one year in advance, at 5 per cent per annum upon the amount due, such payment will be extended for a period of one year, and any payment so extended may annually thereafter be extended for a period of one year in the same manner: Provided, That the last payment and all other payments must be made within a period not exceeding one year after the last payment becomes due by the terms of the act under which the entry was made; that all moneys paid for interest as herein provided shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians as a part of the proceeds received for the lands.

SEC. 2. That failure to make any payment that may be due, unless the same be extended, or to make any extended payment at or before the time to which such payment has been extended as herein provided, will forfeit the entry and the same shall be canceled, and any and all payments theretofore made shall be forfeited.

SEC. 3. That nothing herein contained shall affect any valid adverse claim initiated prior to the passage of this act.

There was no objection.

ISOLATED TRACTS OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 19342) to amend section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to isolated tracts of public lands, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

THE DEAD OF THE BATTLESHIP "MAINE."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I present a report of that committee in response to the letter of the President of the United States, addressed to the Speaker of the House, with reference to the ceremonies at the burial of the dead of the battleship Maine. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 455.

Whereas the President of the United States has notified the Speaker of the House of Representatives that on Saturday, the 23d day of March, 1912, memorial services will be held to honor the memory of the officers and enlisted men who went down to an untimely death on the battleship Maine in the harbor of Habana on the 15th day of February, 1898; and

Whereas devotion to duty and sacrifice of line on behalf of country appeal to the best impulses of the people and inspire noble purposes and lofty ideals in national life and should receive appropriate recognition; and

Whereas the officers and enlisted men of the Maine at the post of duty gave their lives as a sacrifice for the honor of their country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That when the House adjourns on Friday, the 22d day of March, 1912, the House do adjourn until Monday following, as an expression of its admiration for the officers and enlisted men who lost their lives on the Maine, and for the purpose of participating in the services to be held in their honor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution just read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman inform the House whether, under the terms of the resolution, the understanding is that the House is to meet on Saturday or that it is to adjourn on Friday until Monday?

Mr. PADGETT. It provides that when the House adjourns on Friday it shall be until Monday next.

Mr. MANN. The committee changed the resolution.

Mr. PADGETT. We changed the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

H. R. 20959. Sarah J. White.

During the reading of the bill,

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Georgia to 20 minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say only a word at this time. This is an omnibus private pension bill. It contains 253 different pensions for soldiers or their widows. The total amount carried by the bill is about $76,000, about one-half of which represents increases, or about $38,000. Your committee does not claim to be any more perfect than any other committee in this House, but it has given careful consideration to these bills, and we believe that they are meritorious and ought to be passed.

I do not care to consume further time now, but will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE].

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire in this short period of time to call attention to a few facts to show the injustice done the country by rushing through this House a bill carrying 270 special pensions and only allowing 20 minutes debate in the consideration of the whole number. This list includes in part increase over and above what the law provides, and the other part cases placed on the list refused by the Pension Bureau. I disclaim any intention to criticize the action of the committee. I say every Member of this House should act for himself on each individual case. I claim the right, as a Member of this House, to present to the House facts showing that any case on this list is unworthy. This right you refuse me and only give 20 minutes to present evidence and argument against 270 cases. The committee is composed of good men, I admit. The gentleman, Mr. RUSSELL, of Missouri, who has charge of this bill, is one of the best Representatives of the House—honest, courageous, and able. The State of Missouri should be proud of such a Representative. The soldier has no better friend in this House. I do not fall out with him for that, but, as a Member of this House, I feel it my duty to act for myself on proposed legislation, especially when the money of my constituents is being appropriated. This bill carries an appropriation of $76,000.

First, let me call attention to the injustice being done the officials employed by this Government under the statutes and the laws of the United States. I have reference to the Pension Bureau. In many instances in their report it will be found that there are cases where the Pension Bureau has been exceedingly liberal, and yet this report overrules its decisions. I think you will find the bureau has turned down most of these cases, and yet this report takes up these turned-down cases and places them on pension roll. The officials of the bureau are employed by the Government and are supposed to be diligent in the discharge of their duty, and yet, with all their diligence, they have allowed thousands of names to get upon the pension roll who are not entitled to be there and who are drawing and have drawn more than they are entitled to draw. This procedure is poor encouragement to the bureau officials to discharge their duty.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield. I have only 10 minutes. I have heretofore never refused to yield in pension debate, but I can not yield now. I will not have time to discuss more than one or two cases out of 270.

For the purpose of showing the liberality of the Pension Bureau I desire to call attention to the case of John W. Combs, found on pages 6 and 7 of the report. The Pension Bureau has granted Mr. Combs a pension amounting in total to $9,128. I have the statement here from the Pension Bureau. This committee now comes in here and undertakes to increase this man's pension to $40 a month. Where are the fellows who served for four and five years and who to-day are getting nothing and some $12 a month? Why favor this man with $40 per month? Why not treat all alike? He has enjoyed $9,128. Why not give the fellow who has drawn nothing something instead of giving this man $40? What is the committee doing for them? I could take this list here and show that there are women in this report who are very old, some as old as 98, some blind, and some crippled, and some who can not get out of their beds, and they are getting $12 and $20 a month. They are widows who lived through the war and who bore the burdens of war—war widows. This does not compare well with the large pensions paid men whom the record will show own several thousand dollars' worth of property. It is safe to say the full value of property does not usually appear in returns.

Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the record of another case where a man went into the employ of the United States Government in one of the departments in Washington in 1881—31 years ago. He has drawn from that time until this anywhere from $1,200 to $1,600 a year, so I am informed. That man has had two or three special acts passed for him, and in total he has drawn in pensions since his discharge the enormous sum of $24,871.63.

Mr. RODDENBERY. And had a job all the time.

Mr. TRIBBLE. And had a job all the time. He is on the pension roll as a disabled soldier, and let me read to you what the doctor says about it. This case is not in this special report, but I am discussing this case to show you how the country is being imposed upon, how the committee is being imposed upon, and how the Congress is being imposed upon.

No man can stand on the floor of this House and defend giving nearly $25,000 to one man who at the same time is drawing $1,200 or $1,500 a year while occupying a position in the Government service. I am here to say to you that the Government here in Washington, every department, is honeycombed with numerous cases of soldiers drawing large salaries and large pensions and many on total disability act. Here is what the doctor said about this soldier whose record I hold in my hand. By reading from the report the statement of the doctor I do not mean to reflect on him. I disclaim any intention to discredit any surgeon. I contend that in many instances the doctors are being imposed upon.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman please give us the item to which he is referring?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to be interrupted at this time. I have only 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will read what the doctor said:

The reflected irritation upon the whole nervous system, as a matter of fact, increases his trouble so as to unfit him for any kind of labor, mental or physical.

Mind you, this is the doctor who is talking.

He should, if possible, have no enforced occupation; should not be compelled to any business cares of any character.

The doctor then goes on to say further:

And I express this opinion not upon theoretic grounds, but base it alone upon close observation of this case for several years.

Yet the man was working for the Government in one of the departments. What else does he say? Under date of March 20, 1890, he certifies that the wound has wrecked forever the system of this man, and instead of looking forward to possible chances of improvement he must become worse as age advances. Following this comes a medical bill of $600 for one year, as shown by the report.

Mr. Speaker, I am here to say to you to-day that that man is employed in the bureau here at a salary of $1,200 a year, and that he is as able to work as half the men on the floor of this House. Yet gentlemen say that the country is being fairly treated, with such examples as this before them. A gentleman was in my office and remarked that he knew a soldier on the total disability list working for the Government at $1,200. I secured his name and his record. I then sought other names in the departments at Washington on salary drawing pensions, and I was astonished to find men drawing $2,000 salaries on pension roll—many of them. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, you dare not open the gates and let the people take a peep inside of this sentimental wall that has been built around these old soldiers. We are making no fight on the worthy ones. We are trying, Mr. Speaker, to cut out the unworthy, and we are calling on this Congress to investigate these cases, so that the people may not be burdened with taxes to pay unworthy claims. The responsibility is not on the committee; it is on us.

Mr. Speaker, continuing in this report——

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman give us the name?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes; I will give the gentleman the name. I come now to consider the case of Mercy Bates, found on page 34 of the report. Take it and read it, absorb it, think of it, and defend it when you go back home, because your people will call upon you to do it if they know what is in this report. The claim of Mercy Bates was rejected in February, 1910, by what is supposed to be an honest official bureau, upon the ground that she was not the legal widow of a soldier; on the date of her marriage to him he had never been divorced. Neither soldier nor his wife secured divorce. The report goes on to say when the wife left the soldier she took up with a nigger. Listen, gentlemen. I want the members of this committee to listen. When she left the soldier she took up with a nigger. Now, this committee knew that fact, and knew the fact that his second wife, or what was supposed to be his second wife, was never legally married. Now, you Members know these facts as well as the committee. Here is what this report says about it: The soldier informed her—that is, the second wife, Mercy—that he was free to marry her, his former wife having run away with a nigger. Mercy knew she was illegally married.

The report says she was never divorced. The committee used this language:

Believing that the soldier had a legal capacity to marry, and for this reason and for the reason that the former wife had left him and cohabited with another man she believed she could marry this man.

How could she believe that? Is there a woman in this land who is not an imbecile or a lunatic who does not know that it is a violation of law for her to marry another man without being divorced from her husband? She knew she was not legally married to the soldier.

H. R. 5222. Mercy Bates, 75 years of age, sought pension in the Pension Bureau as the widow of Almarin F. Bates, who served as a private in the Second Battery Minnesota Light Artillery from September 3, 1864, to August 16, 1865, and who died April 8, 1909, while a pensioner under the act of February 6, 1907.

The claimant, who married the soldier by ceremony in the State of Minnesota on June 22, 1889, sought pension under the act of April 19, 1908, in May, 1909, but her claim was rejected in February, 1910, upon the ground that she was not the legal widow of the soldier, inasmuch as at the date of her marriage to him he had a former wife living, one Flora, from whom he had never been divorced and who was still living.

The claim was specially examined in January, 1910, and from evidence so obtained it appears that the soldier was first married on October 15, 1860, to one Jane Ruth Miner, who died March 15, 1870; that about six months after the death of his first wife the soldier again married one Flora Williams; that they lived together as husband and wife until the summer of 1887, when the wife Flora left the soldier and took up with a colored man of the name of Whiting; that neither the soldier nor his wife Flora obtained a divorce from each other; that Flora lived with Whiting until his death in June, 1909; and that on November 6, 1909, said Flora entered into a ceremony with one George Griffin; and that said Flora was alive in January, 1910.

The soldier married the claimant Mercy on June 22, 1889, as above stated, and without having obtained a divorce from Flora, the soldier having informed her, said Mercy, that he was free to marry her, his former wife having run away with a negro, and the soldier and the claimant Mercy lived together as husband and wife until the soldier's death on April 8, 1909.

The claimant now stated in her petition filed with Congress that the soldier before his marriage to her informed her that he had been legally divorced from his former wife Flora, which statement she believed to be true, and which belief was further strengthened by her knowledge of the fact that said Flora had left the soldier and run away with a negro by the name of Whiting; that during her wedded life to the soldier and up to the time of his death she had never heard any rumors to the effect that the soldier was not legally divorced from Flora; and that she believed herself to be his legal wife at the time of his death.

Proof filed with your committee shows that the claimant is weak and feeble as the result of old age, is suffering from a rupture, and is unable to perform manual labor; has no property except two lots worth about $200 or $300, and no income of any kind.

She is a resident of Wells, Minn.

The former wife Flora has never applied for pension and has no title now under the provisions of the act of April 19, 1908, having entered into a valid marriage since the soldier's death to the man Griffin, whose wife she now is.

Assuming that the claimant Mercy married the soldier in good faith, believing that the soldier had legal capacity to marry by reason of the fact that his former wife had left him and commenced cohabitation with another man, and taking into consideration that she was the wife in fact of the soldier for 20 years, that the former wife Flora has remarried since the soldier's death and has no title to pension, your committee believe that for pensionable purposes the claimant should be recognized as the legal widow of the soldier. Relief to the extent of granting her a pension of $12 per month is therefore recommended.

I am not criticizing the committee. I am insisting that this House should not pass this bill without investigation and to give the country what we think it ought to have, a thorough investigation of each case by the Members of this House and that special favors should not be shown to the select among them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention to several cases in this bill, cases where the parties own property, large amounts of property, and yet an increase is asked by this committee, in many cases increase to $30 and $40 per month and in many instances where they own considerable property. For instance, on page 65 of report, John Walters owns home valued at $2,500, gets assistance from a lodge, and he is recommended for an increase to $30 per month. John Basquin, on page 27, owns over $2,000; he is to get $36. John Gooman, on page 74, owns 96 acres of land, and he is to get $30 per month.

Gentlemen of this House, it seems to me, should discuss the merits of the legislation in question and not hide behind soldier sentiment and indulge in personal references about gentlemen who oppose this manner of legislation, thereby trying to shift the issue in the minds of the American people. I close these remarks with a business proposition for my colleagues to consider.

The present income of the Government does not exceed the expenses. The Democratic Party proposes to cut the present revenue by reducing tariff. Free sugar will reduce the revenue of the Government sixty millions. This is only one item to be reduced. This shows a depletion of the Treasury. Now, look to the other side of the question. The pension bill we passed increases the expenses about seventy-five millions.

EXAMPLE.

Pension increase	$75,000,000
Loss in sugar revenue	60,000,000
Treasury deficit	135,000,000

How are you going to meet this deficit? Excise tax is proposed, and the highest estimate, should the tax be enacted, is $60,000,000. Granting that it will become law, still you have $75,000,000 deficit. Cut out this increased pension debt and the excise tax will take the place of the sugar duty and give the people free sugar; but, sir, I fear the Senate will not give us free sugar if we give the country pension debts to pay.

I have no animosity to the old soldier, but in good faith I am fighting unjust pensions to keep down expenses that the country may get free sugar and wholesome reductions on all the necessaries of life.

Senator SWANSON, of Virginia, in a recent speech on pensions, inserted in the RECORD the following report of Commissioner Evans:

In 1871 this captain died. He was not a pensioner and never had filed a claim for pension. His widow remained a widow until March 30, 1887, when she remarried, having filed no claim, and, having remarried, had no pensionable status. In 1893, 5 years after the act of June 7, 1888, had passed, 6 years after her remarriage, and 22 years after the death of her soldier husband, she files her claim for a pension as a widow from the date of the death of her soldier husband in 1871 to the date of her remarriage in 1887—16 years—and gets nearly $4,000, practically for the use and benefit of her second husband.

Commissioner Evans, in discussing the evil effects of the arrears pension act, says:

The records of national cemeteries have been brought into use for the purpose of determining the names and service of those buried there. Women are then hunted up, who are induced to execute applications for pensions on account of the service and death of these soldiers. These women become pliant tools in the hands of the operators. A prima facie case is made out by means of stock witnesses, and the originator of the fraud pockets the amount of the first payment, leaving the fraudulent claimant to reap the benefit of the future payments. Great difficulty is often experienced by this bureau in disproving a marriage or marriage relations alleged to have occurred 30 or 40 years ago.

This criticism emanates from Commissioner Evans, a Republican selected by President McKinley to administer the Pension Office.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY].

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the committee to one or two bills introduced here out of the 251 for the purpose of showing that when we engage in the passage of pension legislation, or any other kind of private legislation, special legislation, there is no telling at all where it is going to end, and that it is not based at all on justice or equity, and nobody is considered except the individual for whom the legislation is passed. The question of justice is altogether abandoned and we are absolutely at sea.

Now, I have a bill here, introduced by the genial gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PEPPER], for Thomas Brown. Gentlemen will find it on page 38. He is 64 years old now. He must have joined the Army when he was only 15 years of age. I do not understand how he could have gotten in at that age. On looking at the laws I find that a person could not enlist until he was 17, but according to this statement he got in when he was 15. He enlisted on the 10th of May, 1864, stayed in the service until the 24th of September, 1864—4 months and 14 days.

He has drawn a pension of $12 a month from 1890 until now, and this bill proposes to increase his pension to $24. He was never in a battle, he never received any injury from the service whatever, according to the statement made here, and I take it that it is made as favorable to him as possible. He has already drawn from the Government for that 4 months' service $3,312, and if he lives after this bill is granted as long as an ordinary pensioner is expected to live—20 years, which will make him 84—he will draw $5,760 more, or a total of $9,072 from the Government for 4 months' summer service in the Army, when he never was in a battle, according to the statement, and can not trace any of his disabilities to service in the Army.

But that is not the worst of it. I see from this report that he owns a one-third interest in a homestead worth $3,000. He is worth more, Mr. Speaker, than 75 per cent of the voters in this country. Besides that, he has a yearly income of $180. We propose now to give this man a pension, in addition to the $12 he is already getting, of $12 more, making it $24 a month, Mr. Speaker, and saddle that on the voters of this country, the taxpayers of this land, the widows from one end of the Union to another, who have to work for their living, and 90 per cent of them are in a worse condition financially than he is.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL].

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the country as well as this House has witnessed with profound disapproval the performance which is enacted on this floor whenever private pensions are the subject of discussion. The opposition which has been interposed chiefly by the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. RODDENBERY, and his colleague, Mr. TRIBBLE, is not simply an assault upon every veteran whose condition is to be relieved by the bill, but it is an impeachment of the committee which has reported the legislation.

I believe it but justice to say, Mr. Speaker, that in my opinion there is no committee in this House which exhibits more painstaking industry or displays more discriminating intelligence in the examination of measures within its jurisdiction than the Committee on Invalid Pensions. [Applause.] It is signally honored in its chairman, Mr. SHERWOOD, a distinguished soldier of the Civil War, who is a patriot in 1912, in these pleasant times of peace, as he was in 1861, in the dark days of war. [Applause.] He would no more do injustice to his country now than he would consent to its dismemberment then. [Applause.] Every item in this bill has been carefully scrutinized by him and his associates, and the result is a unanimous recommendation.

Mr. Speaker, the student of affairs will be interested to observe how history, which is supposed to repeat itself, has in the present instance reversed itself. Nearly 50 years ago the men who are beneficiaries under this bill were young, buoyant, and vigorous, and they went marching through Georgia. Now, after the expiration of half a century, they are old, diseased, and decrepit, and Georgia is marching through them. [Applause.] The only objection advanced against measures of this character on this floor or at the other end of the Capitol originates in Georgia. But I refuse to believe that the clamor which has disturbed us here is the voice of that imperial and patriotic Commonwealth. [Applause.] She has been and is ably represented in this body. I observe sitting near me the eminent chairman of the great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. ADAMSON], whose ability and integrity have established his influence and usefulness in this House. [Applause.] And his colleague Mr. BARTLETT, whose service here is of infinite value to his constituency and to us. [Applause.] And my friend Mr. HARDWICK, who has attained such distinction by his conscientious and capable labor on this floor that when he addresses the House he has not merely the membership, but the entire country, for his audience. [Applause.] And our other friend, Mr. BRANTLEY, the loss of whose ripened wisdom and attractive eloquence is a national calamity. [Applause.] These men have conferred more honor upon Georgia than she has bestowed upon them. [Applause.] We have heard no one of them in opposition to these beneficent measures. But apparently we are embarking upon a new era, which, I trust, may be as brief as it is inglorious. Other men have appeared to represent or to misrepresent the sentiment of the Empire State of the South, and they occupy every day that we devote to the consideration of private pension bills by filibustering against provisions intended to comfort the declining years of our disabled and deserving veterans. I protest against it, and I believe I express the unspoken conviction of gentlemen on both sides when I denounce it as reprehensible and unpatriotic. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, this is a moderate bill. It insures a relief which is not available under the general law for 270 old soldiers or their dependent widows. It ought to pass unanimously and immediately. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THISTLEWOOD] three minutes.

Mr. THISTLEWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in justice to the men who belong to the same class with myself I feel like I ought to say a few words. We have crossed the hill and are going down the slope on the other side. There are but few of us in this Congress, but we come asking you to do justice to our disabled comrades. We are not beggars, nor are they. In a country like this there should be no beggars. We come to you to ask you to do simple justice to these men. I have no quarrel with the gentleman from Georgia; I have no quarrel with anyone. I simply desire that these men should be treated fairly. We may be getting old—I guess we are, and some of us are ugly—but we can not help this. We are trying to be with you as long as we can, but, remembering the trials we passed through 50 years ago—I am not speaking of myself but of those who were with me—it is a wonder we are able to stand on this floor and make a plea for them. Here is my friend here with his hand up to his ear. He received that affliction in the Army. There are but few men who saw service 50 years ago but who have had to go limping through life and very much worse for the service they performed. We preserved a united country. It would not seem to those who are on the other side that they were greatly benefited, but it seems to me that the entire people of this country were greatly benefited by that band of men who saved the flag and brought it back without the loss of a single star. [Applause.] I never had any quarrel with a brave Confederate soldier, nor am I going to have any now. I compliment them as being among the bravest men the world ever saw, and no brave man can condemn another brave man——

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. THISTLEWOOD. I will.

Mr. CALLAWAY. In all that the gentleman is saying about soldiers being patriotic in the service and that they did a great deed for the welfare of this country we agree——

Mr. THISTLEWOOD. Make it short, my time is short.

Mr. CALLAWAY. But what does the gentleman say about this pension bill to which I specially called attention, where the records show the man was not even on the firing line and——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CALLAWAY. And yet he has drawn $3,000 from the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. THISTLEWOOD. The gentleman from Texas asked a question which I did not have the time to answer, but will now answer it in the extension of my remarks. He wonders at and seems to doubt the record of Thomas J. Brown, who is alleged in this bill to be 64 years old. There is nothing remarkable about this at all. There were nearly 10,000 men enlisted in the Union Army who were 16 years old and under, or younger boys than Brown. There were 100,000 who were 17 years old and under. The record shows that Thomas J. Brown enlisted May 10, 1864, and served 4 months and 14 days, or until September, 1864. This was the most trying ordeal during the war. The great campaign at Atlanta was on, continuing almost during the entire time of his enlistment. I did not have the time to look up whether he was in any battle or not, but I venture the assertion that he was doing active service somewhere on the firing line. Gen. Hovey, of Indiana, recruited a division of Indiana boys ranging from 16 to 18 years of age during 1864, and they saw battle and did good service.

The pension examiners who last examined soldier Brown stated they found double inguinal hernia, disease of heart, asthma, and deafness. My friend of Texas I presume would want a man about dead before he would receive a pension. He states in his speech, "all that the gentleman is saying about soldiers being patriotic in the service and that they did a great deed for the welfare of this country we agree," but how does it come that the gentleman has failed yet to vote for a single pension bill. He did not vote for the Sherwood bill, neither has he voted for any of the omnibus pension bills that have been presented to this House, although reported unanimously by the Pension Committee. I am afraid the gentleman does not mean all he said.

On the passage of a previous pension bill the gentleman took pains to introduce a statement alleged to have been made by Gen. Charles Francis Adams. Inasmuch as that has been published on more than one occasion in the RECORD, I desire to insert the following clipping from the National Tribune of January 18, 1912, and make it a part of my remarks:

BVT. BRIG. GEN. ADAMS.

The World's Work, the leading organ of "the interests," is continuing its raid by securing a series of articles against pensions and pensioners by Bvt. Brig. Gen. Charles Francis Adams, and naturally the pension-hating papers are extolling Gen. Adams as a soldier of extraordinary merit and a representative of the splendid soldiery which Massachusetts sent into the Army to support the Union. This is a flagrant injustice to the really great soldiers who represented the Old Bay State so superbly during the great war. It is startling to Massachusetts men who have pointed with well-founded pride to such magnificent soldiers from Massachusetts as Joe Hooker, George L. Andrews, J. G. Bernard, William F. Bartlett, William Blaisdell, H. S. Briggs, B. F. Butler, S. E. Chamberlain, C. B. Comstock, B. N. Couch, Charles Devens, N. A. M. Dudley, George H. Gordon, Guy V. Henry, E. D. Keys, F. W. Lander, Charles Russell Lowell, Nelson A. Miles, and scores of others whose names will at once rise to the memory at this late day to have this comparatively unknown man paraded on the center of the stage. Until this publication a very large proportion of the veterans of Massachusetss have been ignorant of the fact that Gen. Adams ever was in the Army. He made absolutely no mark during the war, and since then has held aloof from the Grand Army and the Loyal Legion, with possibly good reasons for keeping himself in the background. That he should have so held himself aloof during all these years from every effort to benefit his comrades and advance their interests and only now comes into the limelight when he sees a good chance to strike at them is a most serious revelation of his character.

Charles Francis Adams, jr., was the son of Charles Francis Adams, then our minister to England, the grandson of John Quincy Adams, sixth President of the United States, and the great-grandson of John Adams, the second President. A man of such distinguished parentage had unusual opportunities for rendering distinguished service to the country had he been a zealous patriot, and as an officer of a splendid Cavalry regiment he should have been continually doing very notable things had be been so minded. It is incomprehensible how a man of such relations and acquaintances and in such a position managed to get through the war without doing something that would attract attention and bring him commendation. As a major in that splendid fighting regiment—the First Massachusetts Cavalry—it is hard to see how, in all the varied services of the regiment, he escaped doing something which would find a prominent place in the Records of the Rebellion and the reports of his superior officers, but the voluminous Records of the Rebellion are singularly sterile of mention of anything accomplished by Charles Francis Adams, jr., as lieutenant, captain, and major of the First Massachusetts Cavalry. The longest mention of him is in a report by Charles H. T. Collis, of driving away the enemy from a bridge near Guinea Station May 21, 1864, when he had with him the Sixty-eighth and One hundred and fourteenth Pennsylvania and a squadron of the First Massachusetts Cavalry, under Capt Adams. He says:

"I deployed my infantry as skirmishers, moved rapidly forward, and directed Capt. Adams to move through the woods on my left to the enemy's right flank, attack him in reverse, and capture his right wing. Capt. Adams, however, owing to the swampy nature of the ground, was unable to execute this order. Having driven the enemy to Catlett's house, I was relieved by a brigade of the Fifth Corps and returned to headquarters."

In the severe fighting at Aldie, Middleburg, and Upperville, in which the First Massachusetts Cavalry suffered severely and several of the officers are commended for gallantry and dash, Col. Sargent's mention of Capt. Adams is confined to the fact that he commanded the Third Squadron, which remained on a hill in the rear. In 1864 Maj. Adams succeeded in getting promotion to the lieutenant colonelcy of the Fifth Massachusetts Cavalry, a colored regiment which was being raised, and he shortly succeeded to the colonelcy. There are a number of complaints from superior officers as to the lack of drill, discipline, and efficiency of the Fifth Massachusetts Cavalry, and the most important allusion to Gen. Adams in the whole 128 volumes of 138,579 pages of the Rebellion Record is the following, found on page 827, Volume XLVI:

HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES FORCES,
Petersburg, Va., April 18, 1865.

COMMANDING OFFICER, FIFTH MASSACHUSETTS CAVALRY.

SIR: The major general commanding directs that you keep small pickets of observation on both sides of the railroad from near the camp of the Twenty-fifth Corps on the south, moving west far enough to cover your position on the railroad and for some distance along the river on the north. Send out daily a small scouting party in different directions from your camp for a distance of 7 to 10 miles with the strictest orders to arrest all pillagers from any command whatever, to investigate and report on all cases of pillage heard of, and to observe the most perfect order. The general commanding is much pleased at the report of the inspection of yesterday, which, together with the arrest of Col. Adams, had been ordered from department headquarters in consequence of the very numerous complaints against the regiment. It is incumbent on the regiment now to remove the bad impression against it not only by the strictest attention to its own conduct and discipline but by detecting and arresting some of those whose outrages on person and property have been charged against itself.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. M. HOWARD,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Massachusetts in the War, a bulky volume, though not by any means as large as it should be, gives in some detail the services of most of the Massachusetts men who distinguished themselves during the war. The allusions to Gen. Adams are markedly meager, there being only three in the volume of 1,029 pages. The first is on page 743, in the history of the First Massachusetts Cavalry, where he is merely mentioned as first lieutenant of Company H, and in all the long history of the regiment he is given no other mention. The second is on page 783, in the history of the Fifth Massachusetts Cavalry, where he is mentioned as arriving in camp on September 8, 1864, and taking command of the regiment. Next is his promotion to the colonelcy and the regiment taking the field for the closing campaign. Then there is this remark:

"Col. Adams, being prostrated by sickness, was obliged to resign August 1, having been absent for some time, and the vacancy was filled by the promotion of Lieut. Col. Samuel E. Chamberlain."

Col. Chamberlain was a fine soldier, who had made an excellent record in the First Massachusetts Cavalry, and immediately upon his taking command the regiment's tone greatly improved. The third mention is a brief statement of Adams's service in the militia, his various promotions, and his resignation. On what some one has termed the "gory March 13, 1865," when brevets of general were given out by the handful to majors, lieutenant colonels, and colonels, and, in fact, to about everybody who asked for them, especially to those who supported President Johnson, Col. Adams received a brevet as brigadier general, standing 1,542 in the long list of more than 2,500.

Whenever a man turns around and assails his comrades it is generally safe to assume that he is gnawed by envy of those who have made a better record than he, and Gen. Adams forms no exception to the rule. Although a voluminous writer, he has never lifted his pen to extol the services of the Massachusetts comrades, and now only comes into print to belittle and disparage them. We have given sufficient reason why he should feel out of touch with his comrades, never having mingled with them in any of their meetings, and now appear as a vindictive assailant.

In conclusion, we reiterate our unbounded astonishment that a man of such distinguished ancestry, with such unusual political and social relations, should have remained on the pay roll of the Army for four years without ever having done anything thought worthy of commendation by any of his superior officers.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. LITTLEPAGE] three minutes.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker, there are two reasons why I am in favor of these bills. In the first place, the last two Democratic national conventions declared in favor of reasonable pensions to the old Union soldier. I was elected on a platform of that kind, and I believe in carrying out platform pledges. [Applause.] There is another reason why I am in favor of pensioning the old soldier. There is not one man on the floor of this House now, and there has not been in 40 years, who would desire to see this Government divided against itself. I believe in taking care of the people who, with their life-blood, with their time and their services, in their youth preserved the Union. Those are my sentiments. [Applause.]

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. I have but three minutes. I want to say in behalf of the Pension Committee that I came here to follow, as best I knew how, the leadership on the Democratic side of this House. I came here to "stand hitched," and I think I have stood that way up to date, and I expect to continue to do so. I want to say to my friends that although 47 years have passed and gone, during which time the people of this great country have been trying to get together and are together, and everybody trying to blot out the Mason and Dixon line, it would seem, from the actions of one or two Members, at least, that is was only yesterday when Sherman marched through Georgia. This Pension Committee is a deserving one. They have worked hard, early and late. I take it that everybody here is honest and wants to be honest and act in a kindly spirit and with malice toward none, but with charity for all. I ask my Democratic brethren, the very few who have attacked that committee so vigorously, to stop. If not, wait by the wayside and ascertain if you are not using very strong language about your brother Congressmen.

You have heard the story of what the boy said to the preacher. The preacher came along and knocked the boy down. The former said, "It is an accident, son; I beg your pardon, and I am mighty sorry." The boy got up and said, "You can go to ——, asking my pardon after knocking me down." [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THISTLEWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THISTLEWOOD] makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, there are more signs of improvement to-day and increasing all the time. Four weeks ago no amount of chiding and no interrogation could induce a Member to rise and utter a word. Now in 20 short minutes we hear from West Virginia, we hear from Iowa, we hear from Illinois; indeed, we hear from all sections. Not only that, but gentlemen heretofore speechless want all the time they can get and even cry aloud for the right to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Let the good work go on, brethren.

I told you then you would not always treat this subject with silence and contumely; that prophecy is fulfilled more speedily than I anticipated. Ah, you defend the committee; you defend Georgia; you defend the old soldier. Why, in the name of courage and public decency, do you not defend these infernal frauds written in this bill, which no man yet has dared rise on the floor and undertake to justify? Why do you dodge behind the old soldier, crippled in battle, whom none of us would deny a liberal pension? Instead of seeking that refuge, why do you not step out in the open and explain why you pension a mock soldier who enlisted but six days before the surrender at Appomattox and never saw a battle? The war was over before he reached the scene, yet he has drawn $5,000 from the Treasury as a war hero, and now you double his pension by this bill. Why do you not defend that? You dare not try it. Talk about the gentlemen from Georgia indiscriminately assaulting anyone. Sirs, we have given instances of deserters and imposters in these bills name by name, and item by item, and put them in the RECORD. You dodge them now; you will answer them later on. You come to-day, for the first time in the parliamentary history of legislative procedure, and move to suspend the rules—suspend all rules—and pass 250 private pension grabs, subject to no amendment, no right of recommitment, no right of consideration, no right of five-minute-rule debate. Every vestige of deliberation denied, save 20 minutes to each side. Your tyrannic rule does not save you anything to-day. I could not have used more time, for want of strength, if it had been allowed. If these are all good and honest cases, why do you not permit other Members an opportunity to consider them and to discuss them? Why do you not yourselves want time in which to substantiate them? They are fraudulent and they are base. Gentlemen, one thing more:

Four weeks ago the committee brought in about 400 private pensions; two weeks ago you came in with 290; and to-day, two weeks later, you come with 250. For this decrease you are to be congratulated. I am candid to say, there is less of fraud, there are fewer of $50 increases, there is less of desertion, there are fewer of treacherous soldiers rewarded here, than in the previous bills. For that the scar-worn soldier and the tax bearers of the country, I have no doubt, will be grateful. A few Members talk of filibuster. Notwithstanding this pending gag rule, if there had been a desire to filibuster and delay, you would have had no vote to-day. Who is filibustering? The rankest of all filibuster against the taxpayer whom we represent is to pass a law with the people's public servants gagged. The alleged filibusters we have conducted have been to force debate, to obtain consideration, to compel a hearing, and to procure deliberation to be followed by a vote. That is the only filibuster I countenance. The filibuster you perpetrate at this hour is indefensible. It is undemocratic, and does not comport with past utterances of Members on this side protesting against this very procedure, whom we may quote hereafter when our strength permits. This sort of gag-rule legislation is contrary to the platform and propaganda on which many of you were elected here. Antigag rule, anticut-off debate, antisnap judgment, anti-Cannonism, was your "stock in trade" campaign slogan. Defend your conduct in passing this rule before the voters when you go home if you can. If I had the time and endurance I would like to go through 50 more names in this bill, taking them up one by one, and challenge you on the floor to defend them. You would not do it, judging by the fact that you have not done it on former occasions. On this rule and on this character of legislation, the fight is just begun. No motion to arbitrarily shut off fair consideration, denying the right of amendment and debate, will deter it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] has expired.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] congratulates the House that more Members have participated in this debate and consumed more time than on former occasions. I congratulate the House and the country on the fact that he has not consumed as much time to-day as he has on former occasions. [Applause.] I confess that this is a new method of passing a bill of this sort, without the privilege of offering or considering amendments and with but limited debate, but I believe, and your committee believes, and I think the House believes, that the peculiar performances that we have witnessed here on former occasions when these bills have been considered by the House fully justify this action to-day. [Applause.]

I believe that most of the Members have confidence in the integrity, in the diligence, and in the fidelity of the membership of the different committees of this House. [Applause.] During my short service I have served on five committees, and I have had more or less business before other committees, and I have become perfectly convinced that all of the committees of this House act honestly and faithfully in the discharge of their duties. We indulge the hope that our committee has so conducted itself as, at least in a measure, to win your confidence, and, if so, will try in the future to so discharge our duties as to merit its continuation. [Applause.]

We witness here almost every week the passage of bills that carry millions of dollars, in which almost every Member of this House, without a word of protest, without a question, accepts the statement of facts and trusts the judgment of the committees that report the bills, and vote for them without any question or criticism. [Applause.]

If I thought that these gentlemen were asking questions to-day in good faith I would not object, and there would not be objections on the part of other members of this committee, to giving them as full information as possible. I will not question their sincerity, and I do not want to question any man's motives, but I will say that their actions have been very inconsistent. On the last day when we were considering pension bills of the same character as this bill to which these gentlemen are now objecting they then stubbornly fought three particular items in one of those bills for the relief of three widow women, and the grounds alleged for the antagonism of these gentlemen was that our committee had improperly and unjustly given those widows each $12 a month. Yet at the conclusion of the consideration of that bill, and at the end of their aimless and useless filibuster, these gentlemen, or one of them, made a motion to recommit the bill and to increase the pensions of all three of these widows to $20 a month, and these objectors all voted for that motion. That kind of consistency may be admired in some localities, but it would not win either admiration or votes in the district that I represent. [Applause.]

Now, just one word with reference to the objection that is made here to the bill by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE]. He produced the impression upon my mind—and I find that the membership of this House understood him to say what I understood him to say—that we were in this bill recommending a pension for the benefit of a woman who had run away with a negro. The fact is that the widow in the case referred to is one who married a husband whose former wife had run away with a negro, and this woman to whom we recommended that a pension be granted had nothing whatever to do with the former wife or her elopement. [Applause.]

Has it come to the point where gentlemen in this House have become so antagonistic to the old Union soldiers who fought and preserved the life of the Union that they must attempt to make this sort of false impression upon the membership of this House for the purpose either of trying by prejudice to defeat or for the purpose of criticizing a just bill? [Applause.]

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me, so that I can ask a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. RUSSELL. My time is short. It must be a very brief question.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Did I not ask the gentleman to read it? Standing here in my place, did I not ask the Members to read it?

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not so understand. I understand that other gentlemen in this House understood the gentleman from Georgia as I understood him, and that was that this widow had run away with a negro. Has the time come when a good woman, a widow of a Union soldier, as the report here shows, who is now 75 years of age, and who is sick, feeble, and poor, is to be punished because a former wife of her husband ran away with a negro? May God forbid that such methods of unfairness and injustice shall prevail! [Applause.]

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; I have not the time, and, moreover, the gentleman, when he had the floor, refused to yield to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri declines to yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, your committee undertakes to act as an equitable tribunal. The point made by the gentleman from Georgia, that the Pension Department has turned down some of the cases in which we have recommended the granting of pensions, is true, because if the applicants could get the pensions at the Pension Bureau there would be no necessity for the introduction and enactment of special bills. But it has always been the policy of Congress—and it is the policy of Congress to-day—to go further than the general law goes in enacting these special bills, and to grant to those who are poor and unable to work special bills in cases not covered by the general pension laws. I admit that we go further than the general law in giving relief in meritorious cases; otherwise there would be no sense or purpose in or necessity for passing special bills of any sort. Your committee tries to give to all bills referred to it as careful attention as is possible, with no purpose in view except the faithful discharge of our duties to the public and to give to the brave old soldiers who preserved the life of the Union in the hour of its peril and their widows simple justice. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. Those in favor of suspending the rules and passing the bill will answer "aye," those opposed "no." [After counting.] In the judgment of the Chair——

Mr. RODDENBERY. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 7.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of suspending the rules and passing the bill will, when their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 193, nays 34, answered "present" 14, not voting 152, as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. KNOWLAND, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, submitted the views of the minority on the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Isthmian Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone, which were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

[H. Rept. 423, pt. 2, to accompany H. R. 21969.]

Firmly convinced that the United States has the right to relieve American ships engaged in the coastwise trade from the payment of toll charges through the Panama Canal, the undersigned members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce dissent from the report accompanying House bill 21969 submitted by the majority of the committee.

This bill, in so far as it provides for levying tolls upon vessels engaged in commerce between the States, is entirely new in American history. From the beginning of the Government to the present time, notwithstanding that we have appropriated $627,098,236.05 for the improvement of rivers and harbors and the construction of canals, exclusive of the Panama Canal, it has never entered into the conception of Congress to erect a tollgate in the path of our domestic trade, for the benefit of which these improvements have been made.

The minority enters an emphatic protest against the abandonment in this bill of our historic policy of free commercial intercourse between the States. This great canal, built for the American people by American money, genius, and enterprise, should be forever a free and untrammeled competing route with transportation by land. We can not emphasize too strongly the elementary proposition that tolls levied upon vessels engaged in commerce between our eastern and western seaboards increase the amount the transcontinental railroads may charge for the same service. If a vessel en route from San Francisco to New York through the canal were required to pay $10,000 in tolls, the transcontinental railroads would largely be the beneficiaries. This question affects every ton of domestic freight that passes through the canal and every ton that is carried across the country by the railroads.

The talk of "subsidizing" the shipping interests at the expense of the American people is mere sophistry and only befogs the issue. The tolls imposed at the canal would be added to the freight and paid by the American people who consume the commodities. We hold this proposition to be fundamental; and viewed in this light, free tolls to our coastwise trade would not be a subsidy to shipowners, but a concession to the American people. Free tolls at the Panama Canal to our coastwise trade would be the same kind of a "subsidy" that was granted to 41,000,000 tons of shipping that passed through the Soo Canal in 1911. It is true that we levy no tolls upon Canadian vessels using the Soo Canal, but that is because American vessels are accorded the same treatment by the Canadian Government at the Welland Canal. By virtue of a reciprocal arrangement we receive our quid pro quo for passing Canadian vessels through the Soo Canal free of charge. We disclaim any antipathy against the railroads, but insist that this initial legislation for the government and management of the Panama Canal shall not take money from the pockets of the American people and give it to the great corporations that have already been munificently treated by the Federal Government.

In a comparatively few instances opposition to free tolls has developed in certain localities in the Middle West based upon the erroneous assumption that any reductions in freight rates between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards will give the Pacific, Gulf, and Atlantic coast cities an advantage over the Middle West cities in competing for the trade of the intermountain section of the West. There might be some ground for this assumption were it not for the fact that rail freight rates between the Middle West and the Pacific coast never exceed those between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, and are frequently lower. Any reduction in rail freight rates forced by sea competition between, say, New York and San Francisco is contemporaneously applied between Chicago, St. Paul, St. Louis, Kansas City, and, in fact, every city of the Middle West on the one hand and every Pacific coast city or town on the other. This always has been so—it always will be so. The selfish interests of the railroads serving the Middle West is the strongest possible guaranty of the perpetuity of this already well-established rate-making system. No road operating between St. Paul and Seattle will permit a lower rail rate to exist between New York and Seattle than exists between St. Paul and Seattle, otherwise St. Paul's trade would be captured by New York.

Therefore if by reason of free tolls to vessels in the coastwise trade freight rates between New York and Seattle are $1 per ton less than they would be if tolls were charged they will by the same measure be less between St. Paul and Chicago and Omaha and St. Louis and Kansas City, on the one hand, and Seattle and Portland and San Francisco and Los Angeles and San Diego, on the other. It is not for the merchants, manufacturers, producers, and consumers of the Middle West to do other than to heartily favor free tolls. It is to be expected, however, that the railroads serving the Middle West, and for that matter the entire country, will strenuously oppose free tolls and with equal strenuosity advocate the highest tolls possible—the only limit being those charged contemporaneously through Suez. Inasmuch as rates between the entire country east of the Missouri River, on the one hand, and the intermountain section, on the other, are based upon the coast-to-coast rates, it is obvious that free tolls would be equally advantageous to this section as to all other sections of the country. Free tolls can not but minimize rail freight rates on all the manufactures of the Atlantic seaboard and the Middle West, the products of the great Mississippi Valley, and those of the Pacific coast, to the ultimate advantage of the producers and consumers throughout the entire country. Nor are reductions in rail rates the only advantages which the people of the great interior of our country are to reap from free tolls. They have even a more direct interest.

Much of the commerce of the great Mississippi Valley will flow down the rivers which drain it to the Gulf and thence through the canal to the Pacific coast. Likewise Pacific coast products will, under free tolls, to a large extent eventually be distributed throughout the Middle West via her waterways. The completion of the Lakes to Gulf waterway project will make it not alone possible, but practicable to exchange Pacific coast lumber for Lake Superior ore without either commodity touching the floor of a freight car. Every burden placed upon traffic through the canal impairs its usefulness as a competitive route and decreases its benefits to the American people.

We are glad to note that in one section of the report the majority agrees with the minority that free tolls will be advantageous to the interior of the country. On page 12 the majority report states:

"By that means (as provided by section 11, compelling connection of railroads in through routes and joint rates with water carriers) the benefits of the canal can be distributed through the interior and enable the entire country to enjoy some good therefrom. The railroads can perform a more noble and valuable service of connecting on either coast with coastwise vessels passing through the canal, and by joint rates and through routes afford convenient schedules and fair rates and conditions of commerce to the people living many hundreds of miles inland from both coasts."

We can not too strongly protest against the following language contained in section 5 of the bill:

"No preference shall be given nor discrimination shown, directly or indirectly, to the vessels of any nation, its citizens or subjects, other than vessels belonging to the Government of the United States (including those belonging to the Panama Railroad Company) and the Government of the Republic of Panama observing the rules and regulations of the Panama Canal."

By this language, which is certainly clear and not open to misinterpretation, the United States is practically foreclosed from giving any preference, directly or indirectly, to American ships in the foreign or coastwise trade, for it provides that we may relieve from the payment of tolls only the vessels of the Government of the United States and of the Government of the Republic of Panama and of the Panama Railroad Co. The language amounts virtually to an interpretation in advance of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty adverse to the contention that this Government can, directly or indirectly, favor American shipping through an American waterway upon which we are expending over $400,000,000.

The report of the majority, in an attempt to explain away this objectionable language, disclaims that it was intended to thus construe the treaty. Regardless of the existence of intent we submit that the language is capable of no other interpretation. It is also argued that no future Congress would be bound. Directing attention to the fact that this is practically an admission that the language is as objectionable as charged, but acknowledging that it might not bind a future Congress, it is evident that if a controversy arose between this Nation and a foreign power involving an interpretation of the treaty, this language would be cited to prove that the Congress of the United States has itself so interpreted the treaty and thus voluntarily surrendered every commercial advantage and proprietary right incident to the construction of this waterway. As an additional excuse it is charged that in the bill introduced by "the leading champion and signer of the minority views" the same language was used. This statement is incorrect, as could have been easily ascertained by comparing the bills. The bill of the gentleman from California excepted all vessels of the United States (not Government vessels only), and specifically provided for free tolls for American ships in the coastwise trade. This is a matter of public record.

While disclaiming any intention to interpret the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in favor of foreign shipping interests, the majority report proceeds to call attention to the rejection of an amendment offered in the Senate when the treaty was pending reserving to the United States the right to discriminate in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade. It is a matter of record that this amendment, offered by Senator Bard, of California, was rejected by a vote of 27 yeas and 43 nays. On the same day, however, an amendment was offered (see S. Doc. 85, 57th Cong., 1st sess.) reserving the right to the United States to protect said canal in any way it might deem proper. This amendment was rejected on roll call, yeas 27, nays 44, and this was the fate of several other amendments similarly reserving to the United States the right to fortify the canal. It is unnecessary to call attention to the fact that fortifications are now being constructed. With further reference to the Bard amendment we have been granted authority to quote from a letter recently written by Senator Bard, in the course of which he states:

"When my amendment was under consideration it was generally conceded [the italics are his] by Senators that even without that specific provision the rules of the treaty would not prevent our Government from treating the canal as part of our coast line, and consequently could not be construed as a restriction of our interstate commerce, forbidding the discrimination in charges for tolls in favor of our coastwise trade, and this conviction contributed to the defeat of the amendment."

We contend that our right to favor our own shipping in the matter of canal tolls can not be seriously questioned. The minority is not forced to offer profuse apologies for its position. The message of President Taft sent to Congress in December (H. Doc. 343, 62d Cong., 2d sess.) has the true American ring, and clearly states the case. These are the President's words:

"I am confident that the United States has the power to relieve from the payment of tolls any part of our shipping that Congress deems wise. We own the canal. It was our money that built it. We have the right to charge tolls for its use. Those tolls must be the same to everyone, but when we are dealing with our own ships, the practice of many Governments of subsidizing their own merchant vessels is so well established in general that a subsidy equal to the tolls, as equivalent remission of tolls, can not be held to be a discrimination in the use of the canal. The practice in the Suez Canal makes this clear."

The Secretary of War, on page 54 of his last annual report, is no less outspoken when he declares:

"Involved in the problem of fixing tolls is the question whether the United States has the right under the treaty to pay the tolls on American vessels using the canal. An examination of the treaty and the surrounding circumstances, to my mind, leaves no doubt as to the right of the United States, both legally and morally, to pay the tolls on its vessels. This is a perfectly recognized practice in respect to the tolls of the Suez Canal, the toll rules of which canal were adopted by the United States in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty for the government of the Panama Canal. At least one of our national competitors in the use of the Panama Canal—Spain—has already taken steps to provide for the payment out of her national treasury of the Panama tolls on one of the Spanish lines which will use that canal. Furthermore, I can see no difference, save in form (provided the tolls for other nations are kept reasonable, as we have also covenanted to do), whether the United States should make this appropriation out of her own Treasury to American vessels, by receiving the toll money from them first and repaying it to them, or by simply relieving them from the payment of tolls in the first place."

Coinciding with these views are those expressed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor on pages 102 and 103 of his last annual report:

"Every State in the Union with navigable waters crossing its boundaries furnishes precedents of congressional appropriations for the establishment and maintenance of improvements at the continuing expense of the Federal Treasury and without a dollar's help from the vessels which enjoy the advantages of such improvements. Where the future of American shipping is at stake and the domestic commerce of both seaboards and the Gulf is involved, there is no apparent reason to depart from a principle which has been so constantly invoked. * * *

"The Panama Canal is being built in the belief that it will benefit all sections of the country and nearly every form of American industry. Our merchant ships and shipyards are as essential to the Nation as our battleships. They have at least a claim to equal consideration in canal legislation and appropriations with other American industries. Every argument to tax the American merchant ship which uses the canal would apply with equal force to a tax directly on American cotton, lumber, fruit, coal, grain, and other cargo carried by the ship through the canal. It is feasible to use the canal for the promotion of American navigation in a manner consistent with treaty obligations, with precedent at home and abroad, and with our fixed policy of untaxed navigation on improved waterways."

The views of the State Department are well known. The chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, in a recent report from that committee (see Rept. 405, 62d Cong., 2d sess.), expresses views in accord with those above quoted.

The minority disagrees entirely with the view of the majority that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty makes it impossible for Congress to prefer our own vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. That portion of article 3 of the treaty which it is claimed would be violated by preferring our coastwise trade reads as follows:

"The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

It is manifest, from the reading of the treaty, that its purpose was to prevent discrimination against other nations. That free tolls to our coastwise vessels would not discriminate against the vessels of other countries becomes apparent when we reflect that under our navigation laws foreign vessels are prohibited from engaging in our coastwise trade. That being true, it is of no concern to foreign nations, their citizens or subjects, what treatment we accord to our coastwise trade.

Foreign nations have not considered that they were violating the rules for the neutralization of the Suez Canal by rebating tolls to vessels flying their own flag. The contemporaneous construction that the powers signatory to the convention of Constantinople have given that instrument supports the position of the minority that we have a perfect right under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to favor our domestic shipping; and if we have the right to collect the tolls at the canal and repay them, we certainly have the right to remit them in the first instance. It is unnecessary to resort to a device or subterfuge in order to do indirectly what we have a right to do directly.

It will be observed that the treaty provides that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality," yet this bill expressly reserves the right of the United States Government to pass its own ships of war through the canal without the payment of any tolls. We confess our inability to see the logic or consistency of the position of the majority that free tolls to ships of commerce would be a violation of the treaty, but that free tolls to ships of war would not be a violation of the treaty. The majority seek to justify the right to exempt war vessels of the United States from the payment of tolls under that clause of the treaty which provides that—

"the United States enjoys all the rights incident to construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal."

Under any fair construction of the treaty, however, this language must be considered in connection with the rules that are adopted in the treaty for the regulation and management of the canal. In other words, under the treaty the United States enjoys all the rights incident to the construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal, subject, however, to the rules therein provided for its regulation and management. These rules, as we have already seen, provide that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality. If this language was intended to prevent preferring our own vessels, it must apply equally to both vessels of commerce and vessels of war. Such a construction is inconsistent with the very purpose of the canal, which was conceived primarily as a military necessity.

The majority dismissed the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332) with the remark that it has no application to the situation with which we are dealing, notwithstanding an examination of the case would have disclosed that on the question of discrimination it is on all fours with the subject we are now considering. In that case the treaty with Great Britain provided that—

"no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States."

The court held that this treaty was not violated by either the Texas statute or the Revised Statutes of the United States, section 4444, exempting coastwise steam vessels from the payment of pilotage charges. In that connection, speaking for the court, Mr. Justice White, now Chief Justice, said:

"Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel, coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, providing that 'no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.' Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and, therefore, any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of the vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even though such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign."

If a treaty with Great Britain providing that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States" is not violated by an exemption in favor of our own vessels engaged in coastwise trade from payment of pilotage charges, it must necessarily follow that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty would not be violated by a similar exemption of our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls at the Panama Canal.

The Panama Canal is being built on territory which was purchased by the Government of the United States. We will expend in its construction upward of $400,000,000, and are obligated by treaty to pay the Republic of Panama in perpetuity the sum of $250,000 annually. We occupy the position of sovereign proprietor of the canal and the Canal Zone, a relation that none of the nine powers signatory to the convention of Constantinople sustained with reference to the Suez Canal. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty should be construed in the light of these facts, and when so construed the minority can not escape the conclusion that in signing, ratifying, and proclaiming this treaty to the world we were merely agreeing to the terms and conditions upon which the United States, the sovereign owner of the canal, would permit its use by the other nations of the world, its citizens or subjects.

While disclaiming any intention of construing the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the majority in the report that accompanies this bill iterates and reiterates their belief that the treaty renders preference to our coastwise trade impossible. The minority believe in the religious observance of our treaty obligations as essential to the maintenance of our own self-respect and the confidence and friendly regard of other nations; but we refuse to assent to the mere suggestion, to say nothing of the bold declaration, that by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we have, without consideration, bartered away to a foreign nation the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce between the United States and encourage the upbuilding and growth of our domestic shipping.

Since 1884 we have consistently adhered to a policy enunciated in the river and harbor act of that year, section 4 of which provided:

"No tolls or operating charges whatever shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed."

The Secretary of the Treasury has recently sent to the Senate in response to a resolution from that body, a letter transmitting information relating to expenditures for rivers and harbors from the establishment of the Government to the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911. (See S. Doc. No. 382, 62d Cong., 2d sess.) This statement shows that the total expenditures upon rivers, harbors, and canals (exclusive of the Panama Canal) has reached the enormous total of $627,098,236.05. The whole country has borne the burden, and no one has suggested that it be placed solely upon American shipping. It has not been seriously urged that the cost of maintenance even be imposed upon commerce. For instance, $121,142,554.41 has been spent by the Government upon the Mississippi River, and it is now proposed to expend a greater sum to provide a deep waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf. Upon the Missouri River has been expended $11,425,056.90, while the Ohio River has been aided by the Government to the extent of $23,548,338.15. While it might be argued that the people of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts are receiving no direct benefit from these river improvements, they are not urging that those States and interests directly tributary to the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers be singled out to bear the burden of these enormous expenditures.

The enlightened position that the State of New York has taken in the matter of water transportation facilities has a direct bearing upon the question at issue. Since the canals of that State were freed from tolls their ordinary repair and maintenance has averaged about $1,000,000 a year. There has been appropriated a total of $147,000,000 for the enlargement and maintenance of these canals since the State declared them to be free of all tolls. If a single State of the Union adopts such a broad policy, can not the Government of the United States afford to exempt vessels in at least the coast-to-coast trade passing through the Panama Canal? The State of New York has also bonded itself in the further sum of $19,800,000 for the construction of canal terminals. It has never been charged in New York that these vast expenditures benefited only those localities adjacent to the waterways, the taxpayers realizing that the development of commerce by water helped the entire State, as would obviously be the case throughout the country at large.

In answer to those who hold that the Government should at least obtain a revenue from the canal sufficient to cover the operating expenses, which they fear would be impossible if we remitted tolls to American ships in the coastwise trade, we will show from the evidence that tolls can be remitted and a revenue obtained with a toll of $1 per net register ton upon ships other than those engaged in interstate commerce sufficient to pay double the expense of operation, maintenance, sanitation, and civil government. We will show this in face of the predictions that the canal will be a colossal failure commercially, according to the majority report. We quote from the majority report at page 5:

"There will undoubtedly be some shipping through the canal between our Atlantic coast and the Orient and some between Europe and the Pacific coast, as well as occasional vessels between Europe and various Pacific ports not touching at American ports at all. Our own coastwise ships and Canadian coastwise ships may constitute the great body of that Panama traffic which is at all certain."

Of this coastwise trade, which is to constitute the "great body of the Panama traffic which is at all certain," the majority report again, at page 6, states:

"Only a small per cent of the American people will ship freight in considerable quantities through the canal."

And at the same page above the freight of this "small per cent of the American people," we are assured, will be carried by a few ships, "for only a few will be needed." If such were the facts, then $375,000,000 have been wasted on a commercial travesty more absurd than some of the creeks which in bygone years were the objects of congressional solicitude and appropriation and of public ridicule. This line of argument recalls the line of attack upon the proposition to build the canal at all which was followed by the transcontinental railroads until the force of public opinion overwhelmed it.

If it were true, then the canal is justifiable only as a factor of the national defense. If that be the contention of the majority, the recommendation that American coastwise commerce be singled out to pay for it is absolutely indefensible. If the canal is a factor of the national defense, the cost of upkeep should be paid for not by a direct levy on domestic commerce in time of peace, but by appropriations from the Treasury precisely as every other form of national defense is paid for.

The quoted statements in the report of the majority do not correspond with facts, to which all the rest of the world has easy access. The records kept by the Panama Canal Co., based on a study of actual ships' voyages, showed that in 1899 the trade contributions to a Panama Canal might have comprised 2,375,071 net registered tons in trade between Europe and the Pacific coasts of the Americas, 1,271,357 net tons in trade between Atlantic America and the Orient, and 202,149 net tons in trade between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the two Americas; in all, 3,848,577 net tons. The Walker Isthmian Canal Commission (Report of Isthmian Canal Commission, Text p. 654, Government Printing Office, 1904) reported the tonnage which might have used an isthmian canal in 1899 was "5,001,798 tons, or approximately 5,000,000 tons." In the annual message of President Taft of December 6, 1910, he quoted one of the Walker Commission to the effect that—

"The total tonnage of the vessels employed in commerce that could use the Isthmian Canal in 1914 would amount to 6,843,805 tons net register, and that this traffic would increase 25.1 per cent per decade."

Finally, at the hearings before the committee only six weeks ago, Prof. Emory R. Johnson, employed by the Government especially to make traffic computations, and whose estimates are generally regarded as very conservative, reported that the net register tonnage of vessels that might have advantageously used a Panama Canal in 1909–10 was 8,328,029 net tons. We quote the statement of Prof. Johnson, found on page 698 of the printed committee hearings:

"It was found in 1899–1900 that 5,000,000 tons net register of shipping was then available for the use of the Panama Canal. The increase during the 11 years ending June 30, 1910, was 66⅔ per cent, or at the rate of 59 per cent per decade. That rate of increase, projected to 1914–15, would mean an increase of 26.8 per cent during the 5 years following 1910, which would bring the total of 8,328,000 to 10,000,500 tons at the time of the opening of the canal."

Of this total it is estimated that but 1,160,000 net register tons will be coast to coast traffic. (See statement Prof. Johnson, committee hearings, p. 705.) We have shown that since 1899 all the estimates of possible canal traffic have been understatements, and in our opinion this is due to the fact that few have anticipated the wonderful growth in ocean steam navigation. When the Suez Canal was opened in 1869 the world's shipping comprised 16,042,498 net tons sail vessels and only 2,793,432 net tons steam vessels. In 1911 the world's tonnage comprised 22,338,549 net tons steam vessels and only 6,152,977 tons sail vessels. The canal as constructed can handle, according to the estimate of Col. Goethals (committee hearings, p. 413), 80,000,000 tons a year.

No estimate has been or can be prepared which will give its business for 1915 at less than 8,000,000 net tons, and we are inclined to the view that Prof. Johnson's estimate of 10,500,000 net register tons is very conservative. We are compelled to conclude, therefore, either that the most gigantic engineering blunder of the ages has been made at Panama or that our colleagues on the committee have failed to digest and profit by the "volume of valuable if not exhaustive information covering the canal subject in all its phases, origin, stages, progress, and future," which we all have labored unremittingly for a long time to assemble "for the use of Congress and the public."

The majority report (p. 4) states that "it will require $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 a year to maintain and operate the canal and administer its adjuncts."

The careful and detailed estimates of Col. Goethals show that the total annual cost of the operation and maintenance of the canal, including the cost of sanitation and civil government, will not exceed $4,000,000, and that it is hoped to realize a profit from the sale of supplies, etc., to bring this down to $3,500,000. (See committee hearings, pp. 410, 411, 415, and 417.) Analyzing the figures of Prof. Johnson, we find that a toll of $1 per net register ton would bring in a total annual revenue during the first year, exclusive of passenger tolls, of $10,500,000. Subtracting the interstate commerce traffic (American coastwise), which Prof. Johnson estimates at 1,160,000 tons, we would still have an annual revenue of $9,340,000, more than double the operating expenses, with the tonnage annually increasing.

We resent the charge, contained on page 6 of the majority report, that "this small shipping interest has secured recommendations from some trade organizations in various coast cities of the country on the erroneous theory that shippers would secure the benefits of the remitted tolls." These "trade organizations," which are spoken of so sneeringly, are not all located in coast cities. For instance, the Lakes-to-the-Gulf Deep Waterways Association, which unanimously passed the following resolutions, is not a coast organization:

"The policy of free waterways is fundamental with the American people, and hence this association declares that this principle should be extended to our coastwise trade through the Panama Canal."

The 1,200 delegates attending the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, which convened in Washington last December, were not influenced by the "small shipping interest." We might likewise mention the Boston Chamber of Commerce, the National Board of Trade, the Navy League of the United States, the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, the New Orleans Progressive Union, the Chamber of Commerce of New York, the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, the Merchants' Association of New York, the Maritime Association of the Port of New York, and various other representative bodies, these resolutions being appended as a part of this report.

We contend that no better opportunity was ever offered for the development of an American merchant marine and the establishment of a fleet of naval auxiliaries which would be available in time of war.

There is no doubt that the founders of the Government and the framers of the Constitution intended to provide for free and unrestricted commerce between the States. Certain it is that such has been our national policy from the beginning. It would be a cause for sincere regret to all lovers of this ancient institution if now, at the threshold of the opening of this great canal, fraught with such wonderful commercial possibilities to the American people, we should depart from the path that has so long been pursued.

APPENDIX.

RESOLUTIONS INDICATING PUBLIC SENTIMENT THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY IN FAVOR OF FREE TOLLS FOR AMERICAN SHIPS IN THE COASTWISE TRADE THROUGH THE PANAMA CANAL.

Resolutions unanimously adopted by the Lakes-to-the-Gulf Deep Waterways Association at the sixth annual convention, Chicago, Ill., October 12, 13, 14, 1911:

"The policy of free waterways is fundamental with the American people, and hence this association declares that this principle should be extended to our coastwise trade through the Panama Canal."

Resolutions unanimously adopted by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, which convened in Washington in December, 1911, consisting of over 1,200 delegates, representing every State in the Union:

"We submit that waterways improved or created by the Federal Government by the use of money contributed by the whole people of the United States should be free for the use of American ships in fair and open competition and on equal terms, without the payment of tolls; but we contend that a water carrier owned, controlled, or operated by a competing land carrier is unfair competition, and in order to preserve to the whole people the benefits of continued fair competition so that the beneficent influence of open waterways shall not be nullified by hostile interests, we recommend the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commisssion, to the end that the commission may more effectually regulate competing land and water carriers and competing water carriers and provide for the interchange of traffic."

Resolutions adopted at a meeting held in Washington December 6, 1911, composed of delegates representing civic and commercial bodies of the Pacific coast, cities on the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic coast, and the cities of Philadelphia, Newark, Trenton, Richmond, Buffalo, St. Louis, Cincinnati, and Pittsburgh.

"Whereas the Government of the United States is constructing, entirely at its own cost, the Panama Canal for the benefit of its own people as a military measure for the naval protection of either coast in time of war and for the facilitation of its domestic commerce as well as for the furtherance of the commerce of the world;

"Whereas the coastwise commerce between ports of the United States is confined by law to vessels registered under the American flag, so that regulations established by the Government of the United States for the use of the canal by such vessels will not conflict in any way with the treaty obligations of the United States with other nations, and particularly with Great Britain;

"Whereas there is a great and growing demand for cheaper and freer interchange of commodities between the States of the Pacific slope, on the one hand, and those bordering on and tributary to the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, including all the States along the Mississippi and its navigable branches, on the other;

"Whereas the opening of the canal, through the continuous and direct water transportation it will afford, will give the people of this country opportunities to interchange commodities of the different districts to an extent never dreamed of before, and thus will reduce the cost of a large number of articles of daily use and necessity to the consumer;

"Whereas ample precedents exist for exempting the domestic commerce of the United States from the payment of tolls for passage through the canal; and

"Whereas the operation of the canal under this condition will greatly stimulate and increase American shipping:

"Resolved, That the Conference for Panama Canal Free Tolls for American Coastwise Commerce strongly and urgently recommends that vessels engaged in domestic commerce between ports of the United States shall be granted free passage through the Panama Canal."

The Boston Chamber of Commerce adopted resolutions similar to the above.

Resolutions passed by delegates representing the various chambers of commerce of the Pacific coast held in San Francisco, Cal., October 2, 1911:

"Whereas the building of the Panama Canal was undertaken by the people of the United States in pursuance of a great national policy, amongst other things of providing for the national defense, of opening up the shortest possible water route between the respective coasts of the United States and foreign countries, to provide through natural methods and to prevent monopoly of transportation means for transportation between the various sections of the Union at the lowest possible cost, to build up and expand our commerce with foreign nations, and incidentally to encourage the upbuilding of a now decadent merchant marine: Be it

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that there should be no tolls charged through the canal to vessels coastwise flying the American flag; and be it further

"Resolved, That we heartily approve of the legislation recommended by President Taft in his message to Congress of December 6, 1910, reading as follows: 'I can not close this reference to the canal without suggesting as a wise amendment to the interstate-commerce law a provision prohibiting interstate-commerce railroads from owning or controlling ships engaged in the trade through the Panama Canal. I believe such a provision may be needed to save to the people of the United States the benefits of the competition in trade between the eastern and western seaboards which this canal was constructed to secure.'"

Resolutions adopted at the forty-second annual meeting of the National Board of Trade, Washington, D. C., January 18, 1912:

"Whereas the Government of the United States is constructing, entirely at its own cost, the Panama Canal, for the benefit of its own people, as a military measure for the naval protection of either coast in time of war, and for facilitating its domestic and foreign commerce, as well as for the furtherance of the commerce of the world;

"Whereas the coastwise commerce between ports of the United States is confined by law to vessels registered under the American flag, so that regulations established by the Government of the United States for the use of the canal by such vessels will not conflict in any way with the treaty obligations of the United States with other nations;

"Whereas there is a great and growing demand for cheaper and freer interchange of commodities between the States of the Pacific slope on the one hand and those bordering on and tributary to the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, including all the States along the Mississippi and its navigable branches, on the other;

"Whereas the opening of the canal, through the continuous and direct water transportation it will afford, will give the people of this country opportunities to interchange commodities of the different districts to an extent heretofore found impossible, and thus will reduce the cost of a large number of articles of daily use and necessity;

"Resolved, That the National Board of Trade urgently recommends that vessels engaged in domestic commerce between ports of the United States shall be granted preferential tolls in passing through the Panama Canal: Provided, That when such vessels are owned, controlled, or operated, directly or indirectly, by any land transportation line or lines, no preferential tolls shall be granted to the vessels so owned, operated, or controlled."

Resolutions adopted by the Navy League of the United States at convention held in city of Washington, February 23, 1912:

"Whereas the building of the Panama Canal was undertaken by the people of the United States in pursuance of a great national policy—amongst other things of providing for the national defense; of opening up the shortest possible water route between the respective coasts of the United States and foreign countries; and of encouraging the upbuilding of our merchant marine, which has practically disappeared from the foreign trade: Be it

"Resolved, That although it is the sense of this meeting that the question of tolls through the Panama Canal is one beyond the scope of this league's present activities; yet be it further

"Resolved, That as we believe the war-time efficiency of our Navy will depend, in part, on the existence of a fleet of merchant vessels available as naval auxiliaries, we heartily approve of any legislation directly or indirectly aiding in building up the American merchant marine, and we believe that if Congress in its wisdom, deems it advisable to levy tolls, that these tolls should be returned to the ships, either in the coastwise or foreign trade, for the purpose of assisting in rehabilitating that merchant marine."

Resolution adopted by Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, December 14, 1911:

"Whereas the Government of the United States is constructing, entirely at its own cost, the Panama Canal for the benefit of its own people as a military measure for the naval protection of either coast in the time of war and for the facilitation of its domestic commerce, as well as for the furtherance of the commerce of the world;

"Whereas the coastwise commerce between the ports of the United States is confined by law to vessels registered under the American flag, so that regulations established by the Government of the United States for the use of the canal by such vessels will not conflict in any way with the treaty obligations of the United States with other nations;

"Whereas there is a great and growing demand for cheaper and freer interchange of commodities between the States of the Pacific slope on the one hand and those bordering on and tributary to the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, including all the States along the Mississippi and its navigable branches, on the other;

"Whereas the opening of the canal, through the continuous and direct water transportation it will afford, will give the people of this country opportunities to interchange commodities of the different districts to an extent never contemplated before, and thus will reduce the cost of a large number of articles of daily use and necessity;

"Whereas ample precedents exist for exempting the domestic commerce of the United States from the payment of tolls for passage through the canal; and

"Whereas the operation of the canal under this condition will greatly stimulate and increase American shipping:

"Resolved, That the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce urgently recommends that vessels engaged in domestic commerce between ports of the United States shall be granted free passage through the Panama Canal."

Resolutions adopted by commercial bodies of the State of Washington, November 3, 1911:

"Whereas the building of the Panama Canal was undertaken by the people of the United States in pursuance of a great national policy, amongst other things to provide for the national defense; to open up the shortest possible water route between the ports of the United States and between the United States and foreign countries; to prevent monopoly of means of transportation between the various sections of the Union; and to provide such transportation to the people of the United States at the lowest possible cost; to build up and expand commerce with foreign nations; and, incidentally, to encourage the upbuilding of a now decadent merchant marine; and

"Whereas it is of the utmost importance to the State of Washington, and to all the States bordering on the Pacific Ocean, that their products—lumber, shingles, salmon, fruits, hops, wool, and other products—be most widely distributed at the least possible expense throughout the United States: Now therefore be it

"Resolved by the following civic bodies of the State of Washington, viz, the New Seattle Chamber of Commerce, the Tacoma Commercial Club and Chamber of Commerce, the Olympia Chamber of Commerce, the Bellingham Chamber of Commerce, the Everett Chamber of Commerce, the Port Townsend Commercial Club, the Aberdeen Chamber of Commerce, the Hoquiam Chamber of Commerce, the Bremerton Commercial Club, the Raymond Commercial Club, through their representatives in conference assembled, That there should be no tolls charged through the Panama Canal to vessels flying the American flag engaged in coastwise traffic of the United States: And be it further

"Resolved, That we heartily approve of the legislation recommended by President Taft in his message to Congress of December 6, 1910, reading as follows: 'I can not close this reference to the canal without suggesting as a wise amendment to the interstate-commerce laws a provision prohibiting interstate-commerce railroads from owning or controlling ships engaged in the trade through the Panama Canal. I believe such a provision may be needed to save to the people of the United States the benefits of the competition in trade between the eastern and western seaboards which this canal was constructed to secure:' Be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each Senator and Representative of the States west of the Rocky Mountains and of the States bordering on the Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico and of the States in the Mississippi and Missouri River Valleys, and that these resolutions be accompanied by a request to the Senators and Representatives of the State of Washington to support and vote for such arrangement of tolls."

Resolutions adopted by New Orleans Progressive Union, February 9, 1912:

"(1) The New Orleans Progressive Union indorses the proposition that American vessels engaged in coastwise trade shall pay no tolls in passing through the Panama Canal.

"(2) Should it be found necessary that American ships engaged in foreign trade shall pay tollage, the United States Government, by drawback, rebate, or otherwise, shall refund amount to such American vessels.

"(3) In the fixing of tolls for vessels passing through the Panama Canal the President shall have the right to reduce tolls to meet competition or other conditions that may arise, after 90 days' notice.

"(4) If the conditions at any time be found that the canal should be entirely free, that the rebate referred to in section 2 shall nevertheless continue to American vessels."

Resolutions adopted by Central Labor Council of Portland, Oreg., October 10, 1911:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that there should be no tolls charged through the canal to coastwise vessels flying the American flag; and be it further

"Resolved, That we approve of amendments to the present interstate-commerce laws provisions prohibiting railroads under their jurisdiction from owning or controlling ships engaged in the trade through the Panama Canal, to the effect that the people of the United States may have the benefits resulting in competition between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, for which purpose this canal was primarily intended."

Resolutions adopted by the Merchants' Association of New York March 5, 1912:

"Whereas the United States, by act of Congress passed in 1884, made the following declaration of policy regarding tolls or charges relative to waterways acquired or constructed by the Federal Government: 'No tolls or operating charges shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use of and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States, or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed'; and

"Whereas, under that policy, which is still in operation, the United States has expended on local waterway developments nearly $700,000,000 at the general expense of the whole country; and

"Whereas the Federal Government, in addition to its vast expenditures of public funds upon internal and seacoast waterways, for the use and benefit of all sections and of all the people, free from imposition of tolls or charges for the use thereof, has also made vast grants of public lands of incalculable present value to the transcontinental railways to promote their construction and the interests of the whole country, especially of the sections which they directly serve; and

"Whereas the Panama Canal is constructed primarily because of the military and economic necessities of the entire United States, and when completed will be of direct commercial benefit to a larger area of the country than any other waterway ever constructed or improved by the Federal Government; and

"Whereas the extension of the general policy of freedom from tolls to the domestic coastwise commerce of the United States passing through the Panama Canal can not create a discrimination against any other nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise because of the fact that no such nation has been or now is permitted by law to engage in such coastwise commerce, which law was in operation and contemplation at the time of the negotiation and ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and

"Whereas the provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty appears to relate to the avoidance of discriminations between the nations and therefore does not pertain to our domestic coastwise trade, in the treatment of which there can be no such discrimination as prohibited in said treaty: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the report of the special committee on tolls on coastwise commerce passing through the Panama Canal, dated February 26, 1912, be, and hereby is, approved; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Merchants' Association of New York opposes the proposition of imposing any tolls whatsoever upon the domestic coastwise commerce of the United States passing through the Panama Canal, unless it be determined, by competent authority, that the imposing of such tolls is required in fulfillment of our treaty obligations."

Resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, March 7, 1912:

"Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York earnestly urges the President of the United States and the Congress, while honorably carrying out all existing treaties or obligations entered into with foreign countries, to arrange the tolls on the Panama Canal so as to carefully protect American interests and bring about the upbuilding of our merchant marine; and that we advocate, as a measure to this end, that the rates of toll on vessels engaged in the coastal trade shall be not over one-third the rates charged on vessels engaged in deep-sea business, or free if necessary to accomplish purposes desired.

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and to all Members of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives."

Resolutions adopted by the Maritime Association of the Port of New York, July 12, 1911:

"Whereas, from present indications, the Panama Canal will be ready for use by merchant shipping in about two years' time; and

"Whereas it is necessary that those contemplating the operation of vessels through the canal should be informed at the earliest possible moment regarding the regulations that will govern said operation, so that sufficient time will be given to conform with every requirement: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That Congress be strongly urged to enact at this session such legislation as will enable the President to fix the tolls to be charged for the use of the canal, it being the consensus of opinion of this committee that in the fixing of said tolls American vessels should be exempted from all charges."

Resolutions adopted by the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, December 13, 1911:

"Whereas the Panama Canal is being constructed by the United States Government, and the people of the United States are paying the whole cost thereof, and will be obliged to pay the cost of maintenance and repairs, whether the revenues are adequate or not; and

"Whereas the people of the United States have entered upon this great work chiefly for the benefit that it will be to our own commerce; and

"Whereas the construction of the Panama Canal by the United States will not give to the American people the full measure of benefits they are entitled to if our commerce is compelled to pay the same tolls that other peoples are required to pay: Therefore

"Resolved, That, having expended so large a sum in constructing the Panama Canal, the people of the United States are entitled to receive the fullest possible advantages therefrom; that other nations should be permitted to use the canal upon reasonable terms alike to all; that American vessels in the foreign trade should pay the same tolls as vessels of other nations, unless existing treaties would permit such American vessels to pass free; that the commerce of the United States passing between United States' ports should be allowed free passage through the Panama Canal in all ships of American registry and should be regarded and regulated as coastwise commerce of the United States.

"Resolved, That we petition the Government and Congress of the United States to give the most serious consideration to the enactment of laws declaring commerce between American ports, passing through the Panama Canal, as coastwise commerce of the United States and free of tolls, and, if treaty provisions or commercial conventions which have provisions for termination by notice from either party will permit, to also consider the making of the Panama Canal free to all vessels of American registry."

Mr. LEA. The senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] is detained from the Chamber by illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, yesterday I requested that the pending bill be passed over for the reason that I desired to move to strike out a certain portion of the bill, a portion which had been voted into the bill by a majority of the Committee on Pensions who were present at the time the vote was taken. I stated at that time that the matter which I desired to bring before the Senate for consideration might become a precedent for the future guidance of the Committee on Pensions, and it was my desire that if we were to amend those rules in any way and have a different standard for the granting of special private pensions we ought to do so under the advice of the Senate.

Mr. President, one of the most disagreeable of the duties which are imposed upon the chairman of the Committee on Pensions is that of holding the rates down to what has been heretofore the rule of the committee, and of preventing there being any special cases of favoritism, or that which would look like favoritism, which might become a precedent in the future consideration of like cases.

I wish to read to the Senate two sections of the rules of the Committee on Pensions. One is section 5, which reads as follows:

Rule 5. Bills for increasing pensions to officers or enlisted men will not be given consideration unless total incapacity for the performance of manual labor is established by the evidence on file in the Pension Bureau or filed with the bill. The soldier must establish his title to and be granted the highest rate of pension under the law applicable to his case before applying to Congress. If it be shown that a soldier who is in receipt of not less than $12 per month is in absolutely destitute circumstances and is suffering from a permanent disability of an extreme nature rendering him wholly or partly helpless, a bill proposing to grant additional pension may be favorably considered. The amount of pension allowed will be governed by conditions of service in connection with extreme disability and destitution. If a rejected claim under other laws exists, the equities in such claim will receive consideration in connection with the bill.

I also read a portion of rule 7:

No increase of pension to widows will be recommended above the general-law rating except in case of destitution to be substantiated by competent testimony, and the word "destitution" will be held to mean the same when applied to an officer or his widow as when applied to a private or his widow; it will not be contracted or expanded to meet particular cases.

There are two propositions, Mr. President, in those rules. The first is that no pension shall be granted at all unless there is proof of destitution. The second is that the grant shall not be greater than will be necessary in the exigencies of the case to prevent destitution. For a number of years your committee in the consideration of cases has been compelled to adopt certain ratings for certain specific classes of disability. Where there has been a necessity for constant aid and attendance the committee has, in many instances, granted as high a rate as $50 per month; but we have by a long course of action affirmed our decision not to grant more than $50 in any special bill, holding that $50 would relieve destitution and enable a person to live and at the same time procure more or less assistance.

The second propositions is that those who are in practically the same condition should be treated exactly alike, because we are attempting to do justice and equity to all of the soldiers, and if we grant $65 a month to one and $50 a month to another for the same kind of disability and the same degree of destitution, we will have done an injustice to the one or else committed an act of favoritism toward the other. If there is any one thing that the committee ought to avoid it is affording any justification for the charge, public or private, that the committee are guilty of the offense of attempting to give one person more than they would give another for the same disability and under the same circumstances; in other words, the charge that we are guilty of favoritism.

Mr. President, in the particular case I have in mind the soldier was receiving $55 per month; the majority of the committee raised the amount to $65 a month; and what I want to show at this time is that the grant of $65 a month to this one soldier will be doing a rank injustice to a dozen others to whom we have granted but $50 per month in bills which have passed within the last two or three days. Therefore, on page 7 I move to strike out all from line 7 to line 10, inclusive, the case of Henry G. Trimble, Senate bill 2595. The report on this case is found in Senate Report No. 441, page 15. It appears that the soldier is receiving $55 per month under the general law for the loss of an arm at the shoulder. A majority of the committee present and voting have increased this amount to $65 a month. The rule of the committee has been not to grant in excess of $50 per month in any case; and if a greater amount is allowed in this case it should be allowed in other similar cases. The report sets out the facts and attached reports show other cases where only $50 per month has been allowed.

The soldier was wounded in the left arm at Dallas, Ga., on June 2, 1864, and the arm was amputated very close to the shoulder joint, which prevented the possibility of the use of an artificial limb. He was pensioned to date from his discharge, October 13, 1864, at the highest rate provided by law for his disability. At that time the rate was $8 per month. Legislation was enacted in 1866, 1872, 1874, 1883, 1886, 1887, and 1903, which raised the rates to $15, $18, $24, $30, $36, $45, and $55 per month, respectively. He is now receiving $55 per month. Affidavits are filed with the bill from credible witnesses stating that the soldier, owing to a paralytic stroke and other diseases and infirmities of age, is now totally helpless. It is also stated that he has no property of any kind. This is a case, Mr. President, where, if the soldier had been receiving anything less than $50 a month, we would have granted him up to the maximum amount which has been granted in like cases, namely, $50 a month.

The Committee on Pensions of the Senate in the past few years has repeatedly refused to recommend an increase of pension in exactly similar cases, even in cases where soldiers lost limbs and were pensioned at $55 per month, on the ground that the ordinary necessities of life could be secured for $55 per month and that a person in receipt of a pension of that amount could not be considered to be wholly destitute. In fact, the Committee on Pensions have set a limit and determined not to report favorably any bills in excess of $50 per month. This action on the part of the committee was found necessary, Mr. President, on account of the large number of bills calling for high rates which were presented to the committee, and in order to conform with the practice of the committee for a number of years past.

I have given you facts from the report in this particular case, and I wish to give a few facts in some cases which I asked my secretary to collect from reports upon bills which have just been passed. I want to read a few of them in which we have granted the maximum of $50 per month:

S. 4567. George H. Garnett, enlisted as a private in Company F, Thirty-first Maine Volunteer Infantry, February 26, 1864; discharged January 13, 1865, on surgeon's certificate of disability because of—

"A gunshot wound received in battle before Petersburg, Va., June 17, 1864. The ball entered at inner angle of left eye and emerged through the lobe of the left ear, destroying the eye and fracturing the superior and inferior maxillaries and rendering him incapable of separating them more than one-fourth of an inch."

He was pensioned from discharge at $8 per month on account of gunshot wound of left eye, ear, and lower jaw. Said pension has been increased from time to time and claimant now receives $30 per month.

From the papers on file in the Pension Bureau it is apparent that claimant has been a constant sufferer from his severe wound; that his digestive organs have become affected from imperfect mastication of food; that in consequence his general health is poor and that he is a totally disabled man. The bureau surgeons by whom he was last examined, November 23, 1892, described his disability as follows:

"We find a gunshot wound which involves almost the entire left side of the face. The ball entered a little left of the center of forehead, ranging downward, making its exit at the angle of lower jaw, left side; it caused considerable loss of muscle, bone, and tissue, and destruction of the entire left eye, almost obliterating orbit; the jaws are firmly set, it being necessary to remove some of his teeth to insert a tube to give necessary nourishment. The eye constantly discharges thin ichorish pus which is irritating and most of the time very fetid; it is necessary for him to have special diet, to have his eye dressed at least once a day in temperate and cold weather, and in warm, many more times; this of course involves constant care and attention of another person and for 23 years it has been his wife's constant care, and since 1885 has occupied her entire time. We find him nervous and of a very sensitive nature, is thin, gaunt-looking and has a sallow complexion; upon slight exertion his heart beats very rapidly; he seems short of breath and his respiration is always rapid. Would recommend the man be allowed the constant service of an attendant."

Medical evidence filed in the Pension Bureau January, 1912, is to the effect that claimant is totally disabled and needs the assistance of another person daily to dress his wound. He is 66 years of age and very poor. The facts as to his grievous disability and poverty are known to Senator MYERS, who makes the following statement:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1912.

Hon. P. J. MCCUMBER,
Chairman Senate Committee on Pensions:

DEAR SENATOR: I have introduced Senate bill 4567, granting an increase of pension to Mr. George H. Garnett, late of Company F, Thirty-first Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry.

I am personally acquainted with Mr. Garnett and his case is a very serious one, and he is most worthy of any assistance which the Committee on Pensions may see fit to give him. During his Army service he was very badly injured. He was shot in the head, losing his left eye and his ear and badly injuring his jaws. After the accident his jaws became set, so that he can not open his teeth to exceed one-sixteenth of an inch, thereby making it impossible for him to masticate his food. Consequently his entire digestive tract has become deranged. This wound is a running sore and he needs the attendance of another person each day to dress it and care for it.

Financially, Mr. Garnett is in poor circumstances, and is absolutely unable to perform any manual labor at all, and, under all the circumstances, I think his case a most deserving one and hope that the committee will favorably consider the same.

If there are any further facts that I can furnish your committee in regard to this matter, I shall be glad to have you call upon me.

Yours, truly,

H. L. MYERS.

It is believed that soldier's condition is such that increase to $50 is warranted.

In this case the soldier received a most grievous wound, shattering his jaws, which have become so firmly set that there is no motion, and he must take sustenance through a tube. He has been in this condition since he was wounded, June 17, 1864. His disabilities are almost wholly due to service. The committee recommend $50.

The next case is that of Henry H. Warner. He was a sergeant in Company C, Eighty-ninth Illinois Volunteer Infantry and served from August 5, 1862, to November 11, 1864. He was several times wounded in battle, in consequence of which he was discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability. He is now on the pension roll under general law at $30 per month for gunshot wounds of left arm and left leg and left thigh, and his efforts to obtain a higher rate at the bureau have been without success, his last claim for increase, filed April 3, 1911, being rejected June 1, 1911.

The testimony shows that the claimant is 67 years of age and that he is substantially helpless and has not been out of his room for several months. In addition to severe wounds received in battle he suffers from rheumatism, heart disease, piles, blindness of right eye, and marked general debility, and requires the aid and attendance of another person. His grievous condition clearly appears from the report of his last medical examination, taken May 4, 1911, and from the papers filed with this committee. The bureau examining surgeon reported that claimant required the periodical assistance of another person, a degree of disability ratable under the general law at $50 per month, and there is other medical evidence to the same effect on file in the case. Evidence filed with this committee shows that claimant is now and has been for some time past confined to his room requiring the constant attention of some one to provide for his wants. It is also shown that he is without means and is entirely dependent upon his pension for support, and it is believed that increase of his pension to $50 per month is fully warranted.

In this case the soldier's disabilities are due to service. He was wounded in left arm, left leg, and left thigh. He is wholly disabled and requires the aid and attendance of another person. He has never received more than $30 per month. The committee recommend $50.

The next case is that of Robert B. Nicol, who enlisted in the Union Army March 26, 1862, for service as a corporal in Company I, Eleventh New York Volunteer Cavalry. While in the performance of duty near Washington, D. C., in December, 1863, he was thrown from his horse, sustaining severe injury of both arms, necessitating his discharge from the service July 8, 1864. He is now pensioned at $46 per month for injury to left elbow, resulting in total disability of left arm, and injury to right wrist. His rate is the highest obtainable from the bureau under the general law.

The claimant is an old man over 80 years of age. In addition to above disabilities he has a progressive deafness, which has been coming on for the past five years, and is also nearly blind in both eyes and, needless to add, practically helpless. He is also a constant sufferer from rheumatism and requires some one with him most of the time. It also appears that he is in straitened circumstances and in need of relief. He has always been a man of high repute and good character, but has been hindered by reason of his disability incurred in the Army from laying up a competency for his old age, and now finds himself crippled and almost blind and in poor circumstances. The facts in his case are fully substantiated by several reputable witnesses and justify your committee in recommending increase to $50 per month, which is the maximum rate recommended by special act in any case.

This soldier was very badly disabled by reason of service. He is getting a pension of $46 per month for total disability of left arm. He would probably have been better off had the arm been amputated. In that case he would have received $55 per month. The committee allows only $50 per month.

The next case is that of Spencer Ford, who was a member of Company F, Fifth Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Infantry. He enlisted August 17, 1863, and was discharged July 9, 1865. He is pensioned under the general law at $30 per month for rheumatism and resulting disease of heart admitted to have been of service origin. He was first pensioned at $8 per month from June 21, 1887; subsequently this was increased to $12, then to $16, $17, $24, and finally to $30 from February 18, 1903. Applications for further increase stand denied on the ground that his condition is partly due to paralysis of left side not accepted as a result of pensioned disability.

It is conclusively proved that the claimant is a helpless paralytic, and that he requires the aid and assistance of another person. His last two examinations—in April, 1908, and March, 1909—were made at his home because he was unable to leave the house, and they show his total disability from rheumatism, heart disease, and paralysis, and his need for care and attention. Evidence of a physician and neighbors filed with this committee also shows that claimant is totally disabled and requires the aid and assistance of another person, and, in fact, can do nothing for himself without assistance. He is 69 years of age, owns no property, not even a home, and has no income from any source except his pension. On account of his helplessness and poverty it is believed proper to give him increase of pension to $50 per month, as proposed in the bill.

The soldier was wholly disabled by reason of service, although his disabilities are due to disease and not to wounds. The committee recommends $50 per month.

I will read one more to show the uniformity of our reports in these cases:

"Alexander Hogelan, the claimant, was a private in Company F, Forty-sixth Indiana Volunteer Infantry. He served three years in the Union Army during the Civil War, having enlisted October 3, 1861, and being honorably discharged October 13, 1864. He is a pensioner under the general law at $30 per month for gunshot wound of face, affecting sight of both eyes and hearing of right ear. Claim for increase, filed July 20, 1909, was rejected October 14, 1909.

"Claimant was severely wounded in battle at Champion Hills, Miss., May 16, 1863, the ball entering the face near left eye, passing inward, backward, and downward, and lodged in the back of the neck, from which it has never been removed. The shock of the bullet destroyed the left eye, and he is also, in consequence, nearly blind in right eye. The wound also caused total deafness of right ear and partial deafness of left ear and has been a source of great suffering, pain, and inconvenience. The bureau surgeon in his last certificate, dated September 22, 1909, reports that claimant is a wreck, and that his condition was such as the result of his service wound as to require the constant aid and attendance of another person. The following sworn statement of Dr. William S. Walker, of Lafayette, Ind., is filed with this committee:

"I have carefully examined Alexander Hogelan, a soldier of the late Civil War, and found him in the following described condition: Emaciated and anemic, walks with the aid of a cane in a feeble, tottering manner on the level floor. In going up steps requires assistance. The left eye is totally blind, the sight in right eye much affected. Total deafness of right ear, and left ear almost total for practical purposes. All the result of a gunshot wound in the face. Heart action feeble, sounds muffled; the radial pulse feeble and the arteries hard; pulse, sitting, 60; standing, 64. The rifle ball still remains in body, and its location at present time is at the inner angle of the right scapula. This point is tender and shows some induration. Soldier, from the above-named physical condition, is totally unable to perform manual labor and requires assistance in dressing himself or in walking out of doors.

"Soldier is now an old man, past 71 years of age. He is poor and needy and depends upon his pension for support. It is believed that his condition is such that increase to $50 per month, as proposed in the bill, is fully warranted."

The soldier was severely wounded in the face, and as a result is practically blind and deaf. He has suffered constantly all his life. He is now a total physical wreck, and his disabilities are almost wholly due to service. The committee recommends $50 per month.

I have a number of others here, but I believe I have read a sufficient number to show that all these are cases in which if the claimant in the case which I object to is entitled to $65 per month the others would also be entitled to the same. I will ask that the other cases which I will note may, without reading, be printed as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"S. 858. William E. Brown served as a private in Company E, Third Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry. He enlisted August 17, 1861, and was discharged March 29, 1863, on surgeon's certificate of disability on account of 'general debility consequent on phthisis pulmonalis and chronic diarrhea,' He established a claim for pension under the general law for chronic diarrhea and resulting piles and catarrh and is pensioned therefor at $30 per month. He applied for increase April 23, 1909, but his application was rejected June 1, 1909, on the ground that his present disabled condition was due in part to other than pensioned causes.

"The soldier is an old man of 75 years of age. When last examined, May 11, 1909, he was shown to be so disabled from pensioned disabilities and old age as to require the regular personal aid and attendance of another person. The examining surgeon said:

"This soldier is extremely weak and emaciated, can scarcely arise from a chair by the assistance of two canes, and then only by several attempts; at times loses his balance easily, and fully requires the assistance of wife and dependent son to get up. Either his wife or son has to be near at hand all the time to aid and assist him in dressing and undressing, washing him, assisting him in attending to calls of nature, bringing him a drink of water. Soldier seems to be thoroughly exhausted on the least effort to help himself.

"Evidence of a physician and neighbors filed with this committee shows that soldier is totally disabled and requires an attendant all the time. It also appears that he is poor and needy and deserving of relief. His unfortunate condition strongly appeals to your committee, and it seems proper to give him increase of pension to $50 per month, as proposed in the bill, a large measure of his disability being due to his military service."

In this case the soldier is disabled by reason of disease and not from wounds. He is absolutely helpless and can do nothing for himself. The committee recommends $50 per month.

"S. 5. Samuel C. Whitwam was a private in Company F, Fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Cavalry. He served from August 19, 1864, to July 1, 1865, and was honorably discharged. He was granted pension under the general law, and is now receiving $30 per month for disease of lungs and disease of throat, and resulting total deafness of left ear and slight deafness of right ear, contracted while in service.

"The evidence clearly shows that this soldier is helpless and requires the aid and attendance of another person. In addition to pensioned disabilities he suffers from disease of heart, paralysis, and fracture of left thigh, making his left leg practically useless. The certificate of his last medical examination shows that at that time, February 12, 1908, he was so totally helpless that he required the regular personal aid and attendance of another person, a degree of disability which, were it wholly due to the military service, would entitle him to a pension of $72 per month. Medical evidence filed with this committee is confirmatory of the findings of the examining surgeon, and shows that soldier is a physical wreck and must have an attendant to assist him to perform even the ordinary duties of life. He is 63 years of age, poor, and without means, and worthy of relief. It is proper to give this man a substantial increase of pension, and your committee recommend the allowance of $50 per month, proposed in the bill."

In this case the soldier is wholly disabled by reason of disease contracted in the service, although he was not wounded. He has been a sufferer ever since his discharge. He is totally disabled and requires constant aid and attention. The committee recommends $50 per month.

"S. 1669. Seth Goldthwait is a resident of New Boston, N. H., and has an honorable military record. He enlisted in the Union Army December 26, 1863, as a private in Company H, Thirtieth Maine Volunteer Infantry; was transferred to Company A, same regiment, January 1, 1865, and honorably discharged August 20, 1865. He is now pensioned at the rate of $12 per month under the act of June 27, 1890. But, while he is paralyzed and helpless and in destitute circumstances, he is unable to obtain further relief in the Pension Bureau, his disabilities not being traceable to the military service.

"Claimant's grievous condition clearly appears from the papers on file in the Pension Bureau and with this committee. He has lost the use of both legs and control of bladder and rectum; is unable to stand alone or walk, except with the aid of two canes or crutches; has lost much of the use of the right arm and hand from injury sustained a few years ago, and is in every respect a helpless cripple. He is 63 years of age, without means, and with no source of income except his pension. He was a good soldier and he is a good citizen, and your committee are of opinion that his unfortunate and helpless condition warrants increase of pension to $50 per month."

In this case the claimant's condition is one of absolute helplessness, although it is true that his disability is not shown to be due to service. The committee recommend $50.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have had many inquiries in reference to cases in which larger amounts are alleged to have been granted. I wish to know whether the Committee on Pensions has recommended the passage of any special bill giving more than $50 per month.

Mr. McCUMBER. To my knowledge the Committee on Pensions has not, at least since I have been a member of it. The Senate may have changed the sum in the case of generals, and so forth, and may have granted a greater amount.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There has been no case where the committee has been induced to grant a larger amount than $50 a month?

Mr. McCUMBER. No. The object, as I have stated, is to meet cases of destitution, and the committee has several times passed upon that question and has virtually instructed the chairman to the effect that $50 is enough to cover any cases of destitution, and that we ought not to go beyond that figure in any case. One day we may have all of the members of the committee present, and we may take a vote upon a given case, and it may appear that the majority of the committee are not in favor of increasing a pension beyond $50 in any case of destitution; while on another day, on which all of the members of the committee are not present, a majority of those present may believe that we ought to go above $50 per month in some cases. Therefore the Senator can easily see where we are left. We do not want to give some a rating of $65 a month, and perhaps the next time give those in a similar condition a rating of $50 per month.

My complaint in this case is not against the $65 a month rate so much as it is against the injustice that will operate against all of the others in giving them a less rate and in having given them a less rate for a number of years.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. These are cases upon which we have passed this year and which have passed the Senate at $50. If in the next bill, the omnibus bill, we take one claimant and give him $65 a month, we will be doing an injustice to all the others, and I know of no greater injustice we can do to the soldiers of the Civil War than to treat one under certain conditions with less consideration than we treat some other soldier of the same war.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BROWN. I do not know how the Senator can argue that by doing justice to this pensioner we are doing an injustice to some other pensioner. If the facts in this case warrant the increase which the committee made, and it is a just increase, and the Senate sustains the committee in that position, I am totally at a loss to understand how it works any injustice to some other soldier whose pension bill has already been passed. It may be true that the soldier whose case was passed on before was not allowed so much as he deserved, but the Senate has acted upon that case. The Senate to-day is called upon to act on this case, and we ought to treat this soldier according to his desserts.

While the cases which were read by the Senator show that the committee had a maximum rule which it always followed and never went beyond $50, every case he read also shows that it was a disgrace and an outrage to give to those pensioners only $50 a month. If that rule is before us to-day, as it is raised by the chairman of the committee, it is our business to abrogate the rule and to do justice to the men whose cases are before us now.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has his own methods of reasoning. He runs around in a circle and one reason kills the other when it meets.

The Senator says that he can not see how in doing justice to this soldier, and intimates that $65 is justice, we thereupon are doing an injustice to all the others. At the same time he finishes his statement with the speech he has just uttered, to the effect that we commit an outrage upon all the others by not giving them the same amount.

Mr. BROWN. No; I said we committed an outrage at the former time.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not understand how we can commit an outrage upon any number of soldiers without doing an injustice to them, and that is just the complaint I am making here. If we grant one soldier $65 a month and at the very same session grant $100 to others who are in exactly the same condition as those to whom we gave only $50 a month, we do more than we ought to do for those or else we ought to do the same for all the others. If we are doing less than we ought to do for all the others, then we have done injustice to them, and if we have picked out one man to give him a greater amount we have, in our partiality in his case, committed an act of injustice. I think the Senator must understand that method of reasoning.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator misunderstood me when he understood me as he stated. I did not say that we were committing any outrage to-day. I said the committee committed an outrage then when it gave to the pensioners, whose cases he read, only $50 apiece. I say that was an injustice to them, and it was a disgrace to the country if it will treat its old defenders in that style.

The Senator's position to-day is, admitting that we did those men an injustice, we must treat these men equally unfairly and unjustly in order to do the right thing. My position is that the outrage and injustice done these other fellows was done prior to this time, when the Senate fixed those pensions, but to-day we have an opportunity to do what I do not understand the Senator says would be an injustice in giving this man an amount greater than that then fixed by some rule of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. We would not do an injustice if we gave him $100 a month.

Mr. BROWN. Then we approximate doing him justice when we give him $65 a month.

Mr. McCUMBER. I really think that when we raise a man's pension from $24 and $30 and give him $50 a month we are at least doing something in the line of justice. It may be that we are not doing all that we should. I am willing to admit that we are not doing all that possibly I feel we would like to do for every one of these soldiers. But I am certain of one thing, if the Senator as a member of the committee, felt that those whom we have recommended at $50 a month ought to have had $65 a month, he should have made his voice felt at that time in placing them on the same basis, as it is the opportunity of every member of the committee to read over the reports if he desires to ascertain the condition of the soldier.

The committee have felt that they must put some limit. Whether it is just or unjust, the majority of the committee have said $50 a month would be the limit, and in order to treat all alike it has given $50 a month to all of those whose conditions I have read, and those which I have asked to have inserted in the RECORD.

It would seem to me that if this bill passes with this condition it would be the duty of the House immediately to strike out all of the others that we have passed at $50 a month and insert in lieu thereof $65 a month.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GALLINGER. May I be permitted to ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from North Dakota how long this $50 rule has been in operation? I am not going to question the wisdom of it, but I want to know historically when it was established.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know it has been established ever since I have been on the committee. I do not remember any case where the committee granted higher than that at the time the Senator from New Hampshire was chairman of the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is mistaken on that point. Perhaps the present system is better than the one that was then in vogue, because we did grant pensions to a considerably larger extent than $50 a month.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think in the cases of some officers.

Mr. GALLINGER. And officers' widows, and occasionally in the case of a private who required the constant aid and assistance of another person and was suffering great physical discomfort. There were a few such cases as that.

I will say this, and it fortifies the Senator's position. It gave the committee and gave the individual members of the committee a great deal of annoyance, because of the clamor that came up for these large pensions; and it will be a great relief to all of us, it certainly will be to me personally, if I may be permitted to say that under no circumstances will the committee recommend a pension of a greater rate than $50 a month, because even now letters are coming to me pleading for a higher rate than that. I had not known before that there was a hard and fast rule on that matter. It would have enabled me to have said to my correspondents that it was useless to undertake to get a higher pension. I have not introduced a bill at this session for a high pension, but I might be called on to do it to-morrow, and if I can say to my correspondent, whoever it may be, that it is needless to attempt to get a higher rate of pension, I will be relieved, of course, from some importunity.

Mr. McCUMBER. I only say, and I think the Senator agrees with me in that, that whatever rate we fix as a majority ought to be a maximum rate. As the Senator, when he was chairman of the same committee, well knows, it was these extreme cases that gave him the greatest trouble. I only need to cite the case of granting a pension of, I think, $2,000 a year to the widow of Gen. John A. Logan. I have never heard the last of that as the chairman of the committee. Every widow of an officer who comes before the committee or before the chairman of the committee cites the case of Mrs. Logan, and insists that her husband was as great a general and did as much for the Union as did Gen. Logan, and insists that she also ought to have a pension of $2,000 a year. So it is with all these cases. If you once pass a case at a given amount which seems higher than the average, those who are seeking pensions will look carefully over our records and will select what they think the highest pay for a given disability, and will correspond or call personally upon the chairman of the committee and insist that their case at least comes within the category of the cases in which high rates have been granted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Will the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. What the Senator from North Dakota states in that particular case is true. I can bear testimony to that. But other cases have given us quite as much trouble. I recall the fact that the present president of the Civil Service Commission was granted a pension a great many years ago for total physical and mental incapacity at the rate of $100 a month which he has been drawing ever since, and he has been in public office ever since. That is not an isolated case either. There are many others, and those cases always did give the committee a great deal of trouble.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I want to say that the rule which has been invoked has not been adopted since I have been a member of the Pension Committee, and it never would have been adopted with my vote.

I quite agree with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] that we can not have a hard and fast rule, because of the fact that different cases are surrounded by different circumstances.

It has been intimated that if the entire committee had been present when this bill was passed, the committee would not have agreed to the bill in its present form. I must be allowed to contradict that statement. I believe the committee would have agreed to the bill had all the members of the committee been there, and I will give my reasons before I take my seat.

I want to say in the next place that instead of these cases which have been read, where only $50 a month was allowed, being an argument against the allowance in this case, they simply establish the fact that the committee, by reason of a hard and fast rule, has done an injustice to these old suffering veterans, and because they have done injustice to them is no reason why they should do a further injustice in this case.

Great as the disabilities were that have been referred to by the chairman of the committee in those cases, there is not one of them that stands upon all fours with this case. In all pension cases certain allowances are made by law under the regular pension laws. Those allowances are limited. Hence in cases of destitution and helplessness soldiers ask that it shall be increased.

Now, let us look at this case. In the first place, this man was allowed $8 per month. I know him well. A more gallant man never lived on the face of the earth. He went from a county that sent more soldiers to the Union Army than it had voters, and he was one who I think was not a voter.

He lost his arm at the shoulder upon the battle field. No artificial arm could be substituted. When he returned to his home he was taken up by his people and elected circuit court clerk. He served with distinction in that capacity. He is one of the brightest, one of the most amiable, and one of the best citizens of that county.

Finally, a law was passed by Congress giving to men who had lost an arm a pension of $55 a month. That bill was passed—I have not the date of it—a few years ago, comparatively. That was the amount fixed by law, not fixed on account of destitution, not fixed on account of age, but fixed because he had lost his arm upon the battle field and no artificial arm could be substituted.

Since that time he has become paralyzed. Since that time his old wife has become afflicted so that she is unable to do anything to help him. These two old people now board. They are not able to own a home. They have no property whatever. There lies this old man bedfast—and I will say that he will not lie there much longer, for the news I get from those who know him is that his days will be but few in the land. There is his old helpless wife with him. He must have some one to wait upon himself and his wife. He not only lost his arm upon the battle field, but he has lost all his power of motion. Not only that, but his wife has lost her health, and there are those two old people without any means of support, both of them having to be waited upon.

Here is a man who got $55 because he lost his arm; not because of his age; not because of his destitution, but for the loss of his arm alone; and he now comes and asks for the pitiful sum of $10 a month in addition to the allowance that has been made to him by law, in order to enable him to spend the very few days that are left to him in comparative comfort at least.

I want to charge here that, while it is true, as the chairman of the committee has stated, that there have not been any allowances made by the committee (save this) exceeding $50, it is equally true that the Senate more times than one has allowed sums greater than $50, and when the controversy came up on the floor of the Senate, the Senate has overruled the committee and increased the sum.

This man should have $75 a month instead of $65. He is entitled to it. I do not believe that the rule of Procrustes should be enacted by a pension committee. We should not cut a man off if he is too long; we should not stretch him out if he is too short. Every case should be decided upon its merits. I appeal to the Senators to decide this case upon its merits.

This man is my lifelong acquaintance and friend. My heart goes out to him as a gallant defender of his country, and one of the best men I ever knew. I beg and plead with the Senate to do at least some justice to this old helpless man and his old helpless wife.

I want to say further that, as a member of the Pension Committee, I am ready now or at any other time to vote to cancel this rule of the committee. The rules of the Pension Committee, sir, are not like the laws of the Medes and Persians. On the contrary, in this very case the rule has been disregarded. Nor can a rule of the committee govern this body.

Senators talk about being annoyed by the importunities of old soldiers and hence contend that it is better to have a rule of limitation for fear they may be annoyed by old soldiers who are asking for help. The plea of an old soldier to me has never been an annoyance, and I trust it never may be. Whenever the time comes that I feel it is an annoyance for a poor old helpless soldier to ask my aid, then, so help me God, I will resign as a Member of the Senate and go home. I am glad to help them. They deserve help; and in this instance this man especially deserves help. I do hope and trust that the Senators here will vote for this report.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I simply desire to say in this case, as I stated before, that the vote of the Senate upon this proposition will be taken as a vote of instructions to the committee, because I think all will agree that we ought not to treat the soldiers differently, and that in all the cases I have read and similar cases, if we grant in this instance $65 a month, we ought to grant more help in all the other cases.

Mr. BRADLEY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BRADLEY. Has not the same thing happened heretofore, that the committee reported in favor of an amount larger than that fixed by the rule, and the Senate adopted it?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know of a single time that it has been done, Mr. President, when I have been present. If it has been done, it has been done when I have been absent.

Mr. BRADLEY. I know it has been done.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senate itself, on motion of one of the Members, has on a vote raised the rating above what the committee authorized, but I now recall no case where the committee itself has recommended a rate that has been lowered by the Senate, or where it has recommended a rate and had the Senate change it, except to raise it.

Mr. BRADLEY. May I interrupt the Senator further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BRADLEY. That is just what I am trying to impress, that the committee has time and again—I do not remember the names, but I know since I have been in the Senate of at least three instances where the committee has made the amount greater than $50, and the report has been made to the Senate and the Senate has adopted the report. I do not say that the Senator from North Dakota was present when it occurred, but I do say that if his idea is to object to this case—he says that he does not object to the amount—simply because it increases this pension beyond the amount fixed by the rule of the committee lest it may be a precedent—then I say he should have no fears, because the precedent has already been established.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there can be no question about it becoming a precedent, and I think that every Senator will agree with me that it ought to become a precedent. Having read all of these cases and shown that they were cases that certainly appealed to our sympathies and sense of justice as much as the case which is mentioned by the Senator from Kentucky, I insist that we are morally bound to grant to the others exactly the same consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if I understand this matter correctly, the Committee on Pensions reported favorably the bill of the Senator from Kentucky at $65. Now, the other cases cited by the Senator from North Dakota are cases in which the committee had not reported in favor of $65, but in favor of $50. Am I right about that?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then, the only question before the Senate will be whether the recommendation of the Committee on Pensions that the bill of the honored Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] shall pass at $65, and not whether the other bill, or any other case, shall be considered on that basis. We can deal with those cases on their merits as we get to them.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no, Mr. President. Any vote upon this case must mean that in the other cases, if they are like cases, the Committee on Pensions have not awarded an amount that they ought to have awarded; and I think it the duty of the Senate Committee on Pensions to take that view of it. I certainly would, and I think that every other Senator on the Committee would be compelled to take that view.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator mean that if we cut this amount down to $55 there will be no limitation to the extent the committee will feel authorized to go? Is that the view?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would hardly say that; but we would probably have a $65 limitation instead of $50.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if my vote were to determine a hard and fast rule without relation to the merits of any particular case, I should certainly not be willing to make $50 the maximum beyond which the Senate would refuse to go in cases of real merit.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator from North Dakota to say that there are other cases, the facts of which would justify as high a rate as this if the committee should feel free to go beyond $50?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have read a number of cases which have passed within the last two days where the circumstances were of such a nature as would justify and demand as much as in this case, and they have passed both the committee and the Senate at $50 per month.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, it seems to me that there is logic in the position of the Senator that, if that be true, if those facts were before the committee, then we must necessarily go back and ask that those be reconsidered.

Mr. McCUMBER. We certainly ought to do so. There is no question about that.

Mr. BORAH. Whether we are paying too much or not we certainly ought to do equity between those who stand upon the same basis and have the same facts to support their position.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the only position, Mr. President, that I am taking in this case. There can be no possible question but that it would be our duty, if the House did not amend the bills so as to treat all cases alike, to reconsider the vote by which the bills were passed, and to place all cases upon exactly the same basis.

Mr. President, I wish to refer to one other matter.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. I do not know whether the Senator referred to the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire or by myself when he spoke of annoyance. I do not think that either the Senator from New Hampshire or myself indicated any annoyance because anybody talked to us about pensions. It is the duty of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions to hear all of these cases; but I think it is just to say that it must necessarily annoy the chairman of the committee to have to say to anyone, "although we grant you only $50 per month pension, we have granted somebody else $65 a month in a case that is no more justifiable, certainly, than your own." Only in that sense, if the word was used at all, could it have been made applicable.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from North Dakota properly interprets what I had in my mind if I used the word "annoyance." It certainly never has annoyed me to do anything I could for the soldiers, and the soldiers the country over perfectly understand that, I think; but when we are asked to grant a pension of $2,000 a year because one woman, the widow of an Army officer, is getting that under a special act, of course it is a disagreeable thing to say to the others who desire an equal amount, or approximately an equal amount, that we can not do it. That is all that I had in my mind.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I can not let this occasion pass without saying that it seems to me that the old soldier is not being considered in this case as entitled to an honor; he is merely being tolerated. To be a pensioner is to wear a badge of honor where the pension is granted for the service of defending one's country. This man, like other men who signed the muster roll, offered his life from that hour to the end of it for his country, wherever he might be sent or wherever duty might call him. There was no eight hours a day with him; there were no conditions as to company boarding houses and the things that disturb a class of our citizens. He was there to do at any cost whatever might fall to his duty.

I never have been in sympathy with granting larger pensions to officers than to privates. I have never been able to accommodate my judgment or my conscience to that rule that seems to have been adopted. The man who signed the muster roll as a private soldier was subject to a harder life of duty than the men who rode at the head of regiments after they were formed and drew $3,600 a year for doing it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him right there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator spoke of a rule which had been adopted, which recognizes a distinction. I do not know to what the Senator refers, but the rule of the committee is that no distinction whatever shall be made.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was not referring to the rule of the committee; I was referring to a rule of action, of practice.

War is an awful thing. In the case under consideration here is a man in the prime of life offering for his country not only his services during the term of enlistment, but whatever might follow, and he is to-day in the service of his country, though he is not on the pay roll. He is serving his country to-day by the afflictions under which he suffers. A man with his arm off at the shoulder joint, a man troubled with the enumerated difficulties under which this man suffers, is serving his country. It is a continuous service. He enlisted for life. Some men enlisted to go home and take up the profitable pursuits of life, the gainful pursuits to provide for their old age, but this man enlisted for life, not the life of a man in health and comfort, but the life of a wretched invalid, who dies perhaps unnoticed and without a word or a line to inform those even in his own immediate vicinity that this man has been serving his country since 1861.

I would have no limitation; I would fix the minimum pension for a soldier, but not the maximum pension. I believe in dealing with these cases each upon its merits, and if we have not time there are some things that we might borrow time from in order that we might perform that duty. Why, we are going to adjourn over until Monday, and yet we have not time, forsooth, to take up and sift down and deal out justice upon merit in a case like this. The argument the Senator from North Dakota made, in which he recited many other cases similar in condition, was an argument that would have turned me had I needed to be turned. If there are those men—and we all know that there are those men—who were disabled at the very beginning of their lives and taken out from the opportunity that other men enjoyed, if it cost me all my time I would go back and do them justice.

We are treating the pensioners as though they were merely subjects to be tolerated; they are subjects to be honored. It is a braver and a better thing to be on the pension roll as a soldier who was a defender of his country than it is to be a member of the peaceful congressional bodies of the United States; and when I see those men, who went from the very midst of their educational period, never to be able to return to it to complete their equipment for the contentions of life, when I see those men who, perhaps because of the stress and the burden and the vicissitudes of a soldier's life, acquired habits that have hung upon them like shackles since, my heart goes out to them, not as subjects of toleration, but as men entitled to the salute of dignity.

There were more wounds in that great struggle than those of bullets or of the flesh. The wounds that left their mark upon the character of the men, the wounds that left their mark upon the capacity of the men to take up the burden of life and hold their own among other men, were more grievous than those which struck them down to death and relieved them of the responsibilities of the duties of manhood.

I do not like a system of pensions that fixes a maximum, but leaves the minimum as the deflecting, guiding line in determining what recognition they shall receive or what assistance they shall receive. Every one of these men, every man whose name was read by the Senator from North Dakota, should be taken care of by the Government of the United States, regardless of cost, to the extent of his necessity—not bare necessity—but he should be treated as a man entitled to honor at the hands of his fellow-men. "Necessity" has rung through all of these pension measures. These men were not considering necessity when they were performing their duties. The man who enlisted at all, whether for a month or 6 months or 9 or 12 or 24 months, offered just as much as the man who enlisted for the longest term. He offered his life, and no man can give more. Many men who went out for 30 days paid with their lives, and that is all they had to give; they could have given no more if they had enlisted for 3 years or 20 years. They gave their lives. Men who went out for 6 months or 12 months or 2 years paid just as much, sacrificed as much, offered just as much, as the men who went out for the longest term. Take the nine-months' men, for instance. The time those men served included the battles of Antietam and Chancellorsville and the great, long, bloody line of battles between them; and those nine-months' men left a larger proportion of their number upon the battle field than those enlisted for any other period during the war, because they struck the high tide of 1862 and 1863.

Are you going to measure their services by months and by days? A man who comes to the muster office when his country's life is in danger and says, "I will give my life for my country"—I do not care if he offers it for only five minutes—is entitled to the utmost consideration. Some of us have seen wonderful work done in five minutes. There were five minutes at one period in the war, five minutes of actual fighting down in Virginia, that reduced a company I have in my mind, whose ranks had just been filled, from 95 men to 13.

Time does not count. Other men who offered the same never saw a battle. Time does not count; it is action; it is what men do that counts. But the credit is due to the man for what he offered to do and was willing to do, and I should like to see these men whose names have been read and whose records have been read treated not as pensioners, but as patriots. I should like to see them treated in their old age as heroes should be treated. It is not so much a question of the pittance due them as of the honor due them.

Mr. McCUMBER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cummins	McCumber	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Dillingham	McLean	Smith, Md.
Bourne	du Pont	Martin, Va.	Smith, Mich.
Bradley	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Sutherland
Brandegee	Foster	Myers	Swanson
Bristow	Gallinger	Nelson	Thornton
Brown	Gardner	Overman	Townsend
Burton	Heyburn	Percy	Warren
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Perkins	Watson
Chilton	Johnston, Ala.	Poindexter	Wetmore
Clapp	Jones	Reed	Works
Culberson	Lea	Richardson
Cullom	Lodge	Root

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, just a word before the vote is taken. I myself am very much disposed to vote to allow this pension—that is, against the amendment—but I do not think we ought to do it without an understanding from the committee that these other cases are to be reviewed and taken up. The plea which is made for those who were in the front in defense of the country is always effective, and it ought to be, and it is especially so when made by those who themselves have participated in battle. But, on the other hand, it is absolutely essential that we do justice to all and treat all alike.

I am not willing, simply because it is the case of one who has a personal acquaintance with this affair and who is known here upon the floor, to agree to establish a rule with reference to this particular soldier that we will not establish with reference to all. And therefore, unless it is understood that this is not to be an exception, that if we vote to increase this pension the committee is to take up and consider the cases of the others, I am not in favor of making an exception to the rule.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, for the last five years—perhaps six or seven years—we have been passing pension bills of this character. How many of those beneficiaries are alive to-day I can not say. We could not very well of our own motion go over those cases again—those that passed last year. We should probably have to depend upon the House to amend the bills, if the House thought the rate was not sufficiently high, or else to bring the rate down to that granted to others.

So far as I personally am concerned, if instructed, as this vote will necessarily instruct the committee, that these cases of total disability requiring attendance should receive more than $50 a month, the cases will all be considered alike, and so far as it is in my power I shall continue in the future, as I have in the past, to see that all soldiers are treated alike. It is and was because of my objection to taking one man and giving him $15 a month above the others that I have been compelled in this instance to object to this man being granted $65 while all the others are granted $50 per month.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator's position exactly with reference to the rule to be established.

One thing more. Do I understand the Senator from North Dakota to say, or did he say, that in his judgment $65 was not too much for this pensioner upon the facts disclosed before the committee?

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not express myself one way or the other upon that question. I do not desire to express myself upon it. The matter will again come before the committee after this vote, probably, and we shall have to consider all similar cases and determine what we ought to fix as a maximum. I would not want to forestall myself or give advice at this time to the balance of the committee as to what the committee ought to do in regard to fixing a maximum.

I disagree entirely with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] that we should have a minimum and no maximum whatever. We should then be like a ship without a rudder, affected by every wave of partiality, and we should grant one just what we happened to feel in the humor to-day to grant and grant to another to-morrow what we then felt should be granted. The membership of the committee changes, and as the membership changes from year to year the committee may change in its sentiment. We ought to have some rule exactly as in the department. Congress fixes a maximum in every pension bill, and the officers of the department must determine in the case of an individual soldier where he falls within that maximum, and whether he shall be granted that sum.

We have many of these cases before us, probably 15,000 having been introduced this session—I do not know exactly how many—and in considering them we must have some rule. There are so many of these cases before us that the individual members of the committee, as has already been suggested, scarcely have time to go over those assigned to them. Therefore the force I have with me, acting as carefully and conscientiously as they can, after having ascertained the will of the committee, by a number of votes, that we should not grant more than $50 a month in any case, have fixed $50 as the maximum. We can not very easily change that to-morrow and then revert to another standard day after to-morrow.

Mr. BORAH. I presume the committee could accept the rule that it would pay every man what the facts showed he is entitled to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; that is, as near as the committee can agree upon it. The Senator from Idaho might agree upon one rate and I might agree upon one, either greater or less, and the committee itself may disagree. But finally the committee or a majority of the committee ought to determine some standard and follow that standard, at least during one session.

Mr. BORAH. I am not criticizing the Committee on Pensions at all. I think it does its work in a most splendid way. But I repeat, if this rule is to be adopted, it ought to be made to cover everyone—every case resting upon similar circumstances and conditions.

Mr. McCUMBER. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I rise because of the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], which referred to one made during my previous remarks, in which I stated that I would consider it more reasonable to establish a minimum than a maximum. If we are going to have an arbitrary rule, let it be based upon the minimum amount that shall be received, and let us deal with these questions according to the equities of each case as it arises.

I do not believe that the convenience of the Committee on Pensions should have anything to do with it. I do not regard it important that they should have a rule by which to deal out the justice due to these people. I see no necessity for such a rule. If the committee has a rule, I see no occasion for its going beyond the report which is made to this body. We sit here to review, consider, and determine the wisdom of the conclusions of the committees, not to be governed by them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Idaho suspend for a moment? The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside upon the request of the Senator from North Dakota. The Senator from Idaho will proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, committees may properly have rules for governing their action in determining or considering the details that they are confronted with, but those rules do not come into this Chamber for consideration or guidance. I speak in no disrespect of committees. Like other Members, I am a member of committees. They consider and report to this body, but I do not feel that the rules made in a committee should be even quoted here as authority for the action of this sovereign body—sovereign over all committees.

The idea of saying that a man shall have only a given compensation, regardless of his rights, merely because the committee has a rule does not appeal to me as basis for disposing of these matters. It is convenient for the committee to do it; it is convenient for the subordinate bodies of this great body to have prescribed and established methods for transacting their business; but the only rule here is right and justice, and it is not measured by any rule except the rule applied to the question under consideration.

If a man is disabled for life because he entered the service of his country, and he gave the equivalent of his life for it, it should not be measured by the standard of any rule of a committee which would place him upon the same basis for consideration as the man who enlisted and went through the service that he owed to his country with minor loss, either at the time or afterwards. Many hundreds of thousands of men came out of the war unhurt and went to the end of their lives suffering no defect and no detriment because they had been in the war, carrying only the added respect of those who had sense enough and patriotism enough to know that a soldier who fights for the preservation of his country is entitled to more respect than the man who does not, and that he is entitled to more respect than the man whose only claim is based upon the fact that he has become the president of a railroad, or a bank, or that he has built a factory, or has amassed a fortune.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho talks himself into the very rules that he criticizes. Finally he would have a rule. One of his rules would be that he would not grant any greater pension to an officer than he would grant to a soldier. Mr. President, that is one of the rules of the committee.

Another rule that the Senator from Idaho would have would be that he would grant to the widow of a private soldier, if you see fit, or the widow of an officer no greater amount than he would grant to the widow of another private soldier or officer under like conditions. Now, that is one of the rules of the committee.

Finally, if the Senator was a member of the committee he would see the necessity of our having some rules so that all should be treated alike. That is the object of the rules. It is to prevent unlike treatment that we have adopted these rules.

Does the Senator understand that at every session this committee has to consider at least half as many pension bills as there are pensions granted for the entire Spanish-American War, and to do that for the Spanish War veterans, as well as the others, we fix rules by which we state in our law what a given disability shall be entitled to receive. The Committee on Pensions in considering this vast number must have some rules to guide them. They are rules that they have adopted after very careful consideration.

Mr. HEYBURN. But they are not binding on the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. They are not binding on anyone, but they are binding and ought to be binding on the committee so that all the cases would be deemed to have been dealt with equitably. If the Senate overrules the committee in one case it should overrule it in all of the other cases. That is the position I occupy here.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, just a moment, while it is warm, if you please. The Senator criticizes my position, saying that I have suggested the adoption of a rule equivalent to that which he champions. I think if he will give that another thought he will revoke it. I spoke of each standing upon its own facts and merits. That is what I am in favor of.

In this case the pension of the applicant is laid upon the table and he is cut off at each end, just the length of the table always. That is the difference between the two positions.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho called attention to the fact that these rules of the committee do not bind the Senate. That is not only true, but they do not bind the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. BROWN. The case before us is one where the committee itself has abrogated and abandoned the rule. A report comes here in violation of this rule that is so sacred so suddenly in a case that has not been paralleled in any of the citations. It does seem to me that we ought to give a little greater consideration to the cause that we are passing on rather than to a rule a committee has not respect enough for to abide by itself.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can not let go unchallenged the statement of the Senator that this case has not been paralleled. Let the Senator go back to the first case that I have read, and so far as the exigencies of that case are concerned it is far worse, and the Senator must admit it if he will read it over.

Mr. BROWN. The case the Senator cites is bad enough. I am not quarreling with the citation. As I observed a little while ago, the case the Senator cited demonstrates that the Senate did great injustice when it allowed that man only $50 a month, but that is no argument why we should continue and extend an injustice to another man.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question. Is the pension which he referred to found in this bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. One is in the bill, I think, that was passed yesterday. I am not positive which one of the bills it is in. Does the Senator refer to the one I cited just now?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Or the one I have moved to strike out?

Mr. BORAH. No; I am referring to the one where the Senator stated the facts were even stronger than in this case.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is in one of the bills which passed this body; I can not remember which bill.

Mr. BORAH. It passed the Senate at this session?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. And the committee limited the amount to $50?

Mr. McCUMBER. The committee limited the amount to $50, and has limited all of them for a good many years to $50.

Mr. BORAH. And the facts in that case warranted a pension of as great amount as in this case?

Mr. McCUMBER. I consider that it warranted fully as much as in this case, without any possible question.

Mr. BORAH. If there is not some way to rectify those inequities, it seems to me we are legislating upon a wrong principle.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I think it may well be assumed that an injustice has been done. So far as I am concerned, as a member of the committee, I was not aware of the condition in the particular cases which have been referred to or I never would have agreed to it.

The question that presents itself, however, Mr. President, is this: Because injustice has been done to one man or two men or a dozen men by the committee, to which the attention of the Senate has never been called, does that authorize an injustice in a case to which the attention of the Senate is called and where the committee itself, despite this rule, has made a report allowing more than $50. Doubtless if the Senators had their attention called to the cases relied upon as precluding the passage of this bill that bill would never have been passed.

I know this case, and I know all about it. I went before the committee and raised this question, and we fought it out before the committee. The committee seemed to manifest justice in this case and made its report.

I am ready at any time to correct, as far as in me lies, any injustice that has been done to any soldier by the committee or by the Senate in any other case, but I insist, sir, that we are now trying this case. We are trying it upon the favorable report of the committee.

The Senator from North Dakota states that it is not so much the amount that he objects to, but it is simply the rule; that he wants no precedent formed, when precedents have time and again been formed by the Senate in overruling the reports of committees confining the allowance to $50.

Some Senators may have come in since I stated this case (there having been a roll call), and if the Senate will indulge me I will state it in a few words again.

Henry G. Trimble went into the Army when he was about 18 or 19 years of age. He lost an arm at the shoulder at the Battle of Dallas, Ga., in consequence of which no artificial limb can be substituted. For years he drew a very small pension. The pension, however, was increased from time to time until the amount fixed by the Congress for a man who lost an arm was made $55, simply for the loss of the arm and nothing else. That amount was allowed to him. After that occurred, years afterwards, this man became paralyzed, wholly unable to do anything. Meanwhile his old wife became an invalid, so that she was unable to do anything to help him. In the meantime the man became absolutely destitute. These two old people have been boarding because they have no home, and both of them have to be waited on.

I ask the Senate to do just what it has done in other cases—to increase the allowance beyond that fixed by law. The amount which is fixed for the loss of an arm carries nothing for destitution, nothing for paralysis, and nothing for old age. All I have asked is simply to add $10 a month more to the pension of this old man to relieve him and his wife in their helplessness in their little mountain home. No; not their home, because, as I have said, they have no home. I have simply asked the Senate to do justice to one of the best men who ever lived in the State of Kentucky; one of the most gallant soldiers who ever gave his blood and his arm to his country; a man who went forward in his young days and surrendered his young life, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has said; a man who has suffered from that time to this, and who to-day is serving his country on a bed of sickness and helplessness.

If this case does not appeal to the Senate, then I know of no case that could appeal to the Senate or appeal to the hearts of men.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I can not agree with the Senator from Kentucky that this is the only case before the Senate, in view of the facts which have been presented here. We are legislating for all those who stand upon the same footing or whose claim rests upon the same state of facts. This old soldier is fortunate in having upon the floor of the Senate a good and loyal friend, and he has undoubtedly received the benefit that one ordinarily receives from such a friend. But if there are others, those who may not have acquaintances here, those who may not have personal friends to go before the committee and plead their cause, who have the same facts to support their pension, there can not be any doubt but that it is our duty in taking care of this particular instance to see that those others are taken care of.

We are, in other words, legislating, as we here so often do, through personal influence rather than through a general principle. There can be no possible question but that if this pensioner is given $65 and the others are neglected and passed by, it will be purely a case of his having a personal acquaintance and friend on the floor of the Senate. It will not be doing justice to the soldier; it will not be doing justice to those who stand upon an equal footing and treating all alike, but it will be simply legislating through personal influence, which we ought not to do.

I repeat that those who stand upon the same footing, who have the same facts to support their pensions, are just as deserving of the attention of the Senate at this time as this particular pensioner.

There are no most splendid soldiers, no most splendid generals, when it comes to a question for pensions, if the facts are the same supporting each and every one. Then they stand upon an equal footing before the bar of their country and before the bar of the Senate. We ought to enforce this rule only in consideration of the fact that it shall be enforced with reference to all who stand upon the same basis.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota inform me as to one thing? I understand the committee reported this case at $65 a month. Am I correct about that?

Mr. McCUMBER. A majority of the committee reported it.

Mr. NELSON. And in making his motion the Senator is moving for the minority of the committee?

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to strike out for no other purpose than that we will be granting soldiers already receiving $55 a month $10 more, and he will be receiving from the Government $15 per month more than any of the other cases and more than we have allowed in a number of years.

Mr. NELSON. But a majority of the committee have recommended what is proposed in the bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the case stated by the Senator from Kentucky of course appeals very strongly to everybody's sympathy. In addition to the point the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has made about the desirability of justice to all, that they should stand upon an equal footing, I should like to call attention to this practical consideration: We have a great number of these bills. For years we have been dealing with them according to the rule of the committee. It is quite true the rule does not bind the Senate; it does not bind the committee; but it has been the practice of the committee and the practice of the Senate for many years. We have all of us had cases where we felt the limit was too low. We have submitted to it because we have felt the wisdom of the committee's action.

Mr. BRADLEY. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BRADLEY. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether or not this rule of the committee has not been repeatedly disregarded by order of the Senate making an allowance of more than $50 a month.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very seldom.

Mr. LODGE. My impression is that it was very seldom revoked, if at all.

Mr. BRADLEY. It has been done several times.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly very rarely. It has been the practice of the Senate to follow the committee.

Now, Mr. President, the Senate has been discussing this one case for something more than two hours. If all the limitations by the committee are removed, it will be the duty of every Senator in every case that awakens his sympathy and of which he has personal knowledge to come in here and get the largest possible pension for the case in which he is interested. It will be absolutely impossible to deal with the pension cases that come before us. There are 15,000, I think the chairman said, in this Congress. It will be absolutely impossible for us to deal with more than a comparatively small percentage of cases. The result will be that there will be hundreds of men who will get nothing, while we are struggling, each one of us, as we should be bound to do, to get the utmost we could in every case that excites our sympathy.

If we are not bounded by some general limitations as the law lays down, the practical result, to my mind, will be that we shall not only not treat all who are on an equal footing alike, but we shall shut out hundreds of deserving cases from ever being heard at all, because there will not be time to deal with them. It will not be physically possible for the committee or the Senate to deal with the cases if each individual case has got to be fought out here on its merits, the Senator who has it in charge contending for what he thinks is right.

What we want to do, Mr. President, is to do the greatest measure of justice we can to all the cases, and not to single out one and get into the practice of dealing with each case by itself without reference to the committee's action.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I want to make a single observation. There is no limit in the lower House of Congress in the Pension Committee at this time, nor has there been for years. A number of bills have been passed in the lower House allowing $60 per month.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. BRADLEY. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. It is true there is no limit on the amount of pension that may be granted, but there is a limit on debate in the House.

Mr. BRADLEY. If that limit were enforced in the Senate I fear the Senator from Massachusetts would lose much of the time he occupies in that way.

Mr. LODGE. Very likely.

Mr. BRADLEY. I have occupied very little time.

Mr. LODGE. I spoke about three minutes on this question. I do not know what the Senator did.

Mr. BRADLEY. But I am very plain and very truthful in saying the Senator has spoken three hours to my three minutes since I have been in the Senate. I have consumed but very little time of the Senate. So far as I am concerned, I regret that I have had to consume any on this question. It was not my purpose to do it. It is not by my action, by any sort of means, that this debate has been precipitated, but by the action of others.

Now, the question I want to ask is this: What are we going to do with these bills that come over from the House, where they allow $60? Shall we say that the rule of the Senate shall control the legislation of the House? If this precedent was overruled but once, when the rule of the committee was disregarded once, the bill passed became a law; it was a law that overruled a rule of the committee, and we are bound by the law rather than by the rules of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think that in the case in which the Senator from Kentucky is interested the soldier is now pensioned under the general law at $55 a month, which is seemingly in conflict with the arbitrary rule of the Pension Committee when the disability is loss of an arm.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the law gives a man whose blindness is the result of disability of service origin $100 a month. The committee does not give any greater amount in any of the cases. We do not give $50 nor $60 nor anything else. We say in those cases that the Government itself has given the soldier enough, so that it takes his case out of the principle of special legislation, namely, the principle of destitution. Therefore we do not consider any of those cases. We have not a single case of that kind.

Now, according to the Senator's argument, if a pensioner gets $100 a month because he is blind, and he becomes paralyzed, we should raise it $10 more a month, so as to make it $110, because the Government is already giving him $100.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; but according to the Senator's argument $55, which the general law gives to a soldier who lost an arm, is in excess of the rule of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; we do not interfere with the general legislation. We simply say, and I believe that is the purpose of the Committee on Pensions, that we grant pensions in special cases because the law in that particular case does not give enough to the pensioner to bring his case out of the plane of destitution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if this soldier had been a banker or a man of large means, under the general law he would be a pensioner at $55 a month, would he not?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; if he had been a billionaire it would have made no difference.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Under the law, if he lost an arm in war he would have been a pensioner at $55 a month, whether he needed it or not. That is the general rule that has been laid down by Congress. That is the law to-day.

Mr. BORAH. It is a very unjust law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Be it an unjust law or otherwise, I am not now arguing that matter. But in this particular case, if the statements of the honored Senator from Kentucky are to be accepted, this soldier is not getting enough under the general law. I do not believe that any soldier gets too much under the general or special law.

Mr. McCUMBER. The only matter that I want to meet is the fallacy of the Senator's argument that if the general law gave a certain amount, in a case of destitution or a case of additional injury we should go above that amount, because the general law had recognized a sum greater than we would grant. The Senator ought to keep, and the Senate ought to keep, constantly in mind the great, grand purpose of special legislation, to reach those cases of destitution that the general law does not reach, and in reaching those cases of destitution the moral obligation rests upon the Senate and upon the committee to treat every soldier alike and to have no favorites. That is all the chairman of the committee stands for.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to know, again, if it is within the power of the committee to rectify these mistakes which have been made at this session?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senate can do it.

Mr. BORAH. I am afraid if the committee does not do it the Senate, after the eloquent Senator from Kentucky has ceased to be interested, will forget about the others.

I do not propose, Mr. President, much as I should like to assist this particular soldier, to vote for a rule which will be applied to him alone, when the evidence or the facts here are that there are a number of others who stand in precisely the same position who have not the good fortune to have the personal acquaintance of a Senator of the United States.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, so far as any injustice has been done to anybody, I am perfectly willing to introduce any bill that is necessary to see that justice is done. I want to say, in addition to that, that my esteemed friend from Idaho is a little mistaken when he says that the cases which have been referred to are exactly like the case that is now before the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Well, some of them are not exactly like it, but seem to be worse.

Mr. BRADLEY. None of them are as bad.

Mr. BORAH. I have the statement of the Senator from North Dakota, who, I know, is quite familiar with all pension matters.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator can read one case, if he wants to, and he can determine whether or not it is a case as bad as that. All he needs to read is the statement made by the examining surgeon.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is a case in this very bill that appeals to me. I will not read all the report contains; but it is the case of Henry M. Endsley, which is found on page 19 of the report. He served in the Mexican War for a year and in the Civil War for three years. He is 90 years old and is helpless from rheumatism, disease of the heart, and old age, and requires the aid and assistance of another person; and $50 is provided for him in this very bill. It is manifest that this old veteran of two wars, at the age of 90 years, practically helpless and requiring the aid and attendance of another person, ought at least to receive as much as the soldier whose case we have been considering. So that, if the rule is departed from, there will be inequalities that ought to be corrected, and this particular case ought to be corrected in this bill.

Mr. BRADLEY. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BRADLEY. Did this man lose an arm?

Mr. GALLINGER. He did not; but I do not think that makes any difference.

Mr. BRADLEY. Oh, of course not——

Mr. GALLINGER. That does not make any difference. The soldier who lost an arm got a larger pension from the time he left the Army because of the loss of that arm.

Mr. BRADLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly he got a larger pension than the other man. It has been increased six times and more as appears from the report.

Mr. BRADLEY. But the pension he is receiving now was granted only a comparatively short time ago.

Mr. GALLINGER. But all through his history since the close of the Civil War he received a larger pension than the ordinary soldier did for disabilities. We have been more liberal with that class of soldiers.

Mr. BORAH. I find here is a case where a man did not lose an arm, but lost his jaw.

Mr. BRADLEY. That was worse.

Mr. McCUMBER. And lost an eye and the hearing of both ears.

Mr. BORAH. He also lost an eye and is deaf.

Mr. BRADLEY. I might suggest that the loss of a jaw would be a good thing for some Senators. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. I am satisfied if my friend from Kentucky had been thus afflicted this bill would not be in the Senate.

Mr. President, I am only interested in one consideration, and that is in the equity of this rule. I want to know whether or not these matters are going to be corrected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota to strike out the clause on page 7, from line 7 to line 10, inclusive. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" appear to have it.

Mr. BRADLEY. I ask for a division.

The amendment was rejected, there being on a division—ayes 17, noes 19.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions offered by the Senator from Vermont will be read.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. As a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 25, 1912, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite and eternal Spirit, our heavenly Father, in whom we live and move and have our being, our faith looks up to Thee in this hour of sorrow and grief. Surely Thou givest life and taketh it away, not in death but in the larger life which awaits us all. A great sorrow has fallen into our hearts because one of our number has been taken away from us who for many years held a conspicuous place in the committee room and on the floor of this House; strong, pure, aggressive, he served his State and Nation with untiring energy. Help us to keep his memory green and copy his virtues. Solace the bereaved family with the hopes and promises of a bright beyond when the voice which was music to their ears, the eyes which looked love into their hearts, and the strong arms which upheld and sustained them shall receive them once more in a realm where there are no separations. "We are born for a higher destiny than that of earth. There is a realm where the rainbow never fades, where the stars will be spread out before us like the islands that slumber on the ocean, and where the beautiful beings that here pass before us like visions will stay in our presence forever." Thus may we believe; thus may we hope in the promises of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

APACHE INDIANS, FORT SILL, OKLA.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee on Indian Affairs from the further consideration of House resolution 420, which was referred to that committee on February 20 last.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 420.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to this House at as early a date as may be convenient a report setting forth—

First. How many Apache Indians are now held as prisoners of war at the Fort Sill (Okla.) Reservation.

Second. How many of said Indians are males, and how many are females.

Third. How many of said male Indians are under 40 years of age.

Fourth. How many of said Indians are known, at any time prior to their capture, to have been engaged in hostilities against the United States, or to have committed acts of violence against citizens or residents of the United States.

Fifth. The names, ages, present condition of health and general conduct of the Indians coming under the terms of the last paragraph.

Sixth. The military necessity, if any, for continuing to hold said Apache Indians as prisoners of war.

Seventh. By what authority the said Apache Indians are now held as prisoners of war, and particularly by what authority those of said Indians who were born in captivity, and who have come of age while still in captivity, are so held

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to discharge the Committee on Indian Affairs from the further consideration of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of War has on file with the Committee on Indian Affairs a full and complete report with reference to this matter, made after a long and careful investigation conducted last October. I had no notice or information that this was coming up at this time, and I do not know that I have any opposition to it other than that I thought it was proper to state that there is some legislation pending to dispose of this matter, and the Secretary of War has reported at great length upon it. I do not, looking at it hurriedly, see anything in the resolution that is objectionable, but the resolution has had no consideration in the committee at all.

The SPEAKER. That is the very thing that makes it privileged.

Mr. PALMER. It is hardly correct for the gentleman to say that he has had no information about this resolution.

Mr. FERRIS. I do say that.

Mr. PALMER. I spoke to the gentleman and to the chairman of the committee, and to other members of the committee, about the resolution, and they all agreed with me that the information which I was after was proper to be considered by the committee in connection with legislation pending before that committee. This resolution of inquiry went to the Committee on Indian Affairs more than a month ago, and under the rules some report, either favorable or adverse, should have been made within seven days.

It is because the Committee on Indian Affairs has given no consideration to the matter that I am asking that this resolution be now passed. If it be true, as the gentleman states, that the Secretary of War has made report on this proposition, that is the first knowledge I have had that such is the fact, and other friends of these Apache Indians, who were interested adversely to the proposed legislation by which these Apaches will be taken from what they claim to be their own reservation and transplanted down into the southwestern part of the country somewhere, have not had any information, either.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman does not say that he ever talked to me about a resolution of this kind?

Mr. PALMER. Oh, yes, I do.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman was never more seriously mistaken in his life than he is now. He talked to me about the Indians, but he never at any time intimated that he had anything pending for them or in their behalf, and certainly has never appeared before the committee, for I never have missed one session of the committee. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has never been before the committee at any time and has never mentioned it to me personally.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to get into a discussion involving the recollection, much less the veracity, of the gentleman from Oklahoma and myself. He probably misunderstood what I said to him in reference to it. The gentleman from Oklahoma has introduced a bill which, in effect, will take these Indians, who have been held as prisoners of war for the last 25 years—the Apaches at Fort Sill—and transplant them down into Arizona or New Mexico among the Mescalero Indians. There are something in the neighborhood of 240 of these Indians at the present time, only perhaps a half dozen or more being amongst those who were originally taken prisoners when Geronimo and his band were imprisoned at Fort Sill.

A large grant of land has been made on the condition, as I understand it, that it should be allotted finally as a home for these Indians, and friends of the Indians in other parts of the country are very seriously objecting to any movement which will take the Indians from the land which they claim to be their own, and which they think ought to be allotted to them for homes after they are released as prisoners of war. After the gentleman from Oklahoma had introduced that bill, and it had been called to my attention by some Friends in Pennsylvania, who were interested in this tribe of Indian prisoners, I spoke to the gentleman in reference to it and told him that I had been urged to oppose it, and that I had concluded to start the matter by asking for some definite information from the War Department in relation to the number and the condition of these Indian prisoners of war, and that a resolution of that kind had been introduced by me and referred to his committee.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, the gentleman does not say that he said that to me?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is very much mistaken.

Mr. PALMER. Well, it is a small matter. I talked with the gentleman about it.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman talked with me about my bill, but never about his bill.

Mr. PALMER. Yes; about the gentleman's bill and about the information that I desired to get by this resolution of inquiry. Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, the resolution was introduced, and it went to the Committee on Indian Affairs on the 20th of February, and, as I understand it, there is no objection on the part of the Committee on Indian Affairs to getting all this information before any legislation of any character in relation to these Indian prisoners of war is put through the committee.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it is not the custom of our committee, or of any committee of the House that I know of, to take up any resolution or bill unless the author of the resolution or bill comes before the committee and requests that it be taken up. There are always Members present at our committee meetings with bills and resolutions that are pressing for consideration. I presume the same rule obtains in other committees. I have no objection whatever to this resolution. I desire to say that these Mescalero Apache prisoners escaped from their reservation in New Mexico, under the leadership of Geronimo, some years ago and murdered a great many helpless citizens, including women and children, and destroyed a great deal of property. They were captured by the soldiers of the United States Army and first carried to Florida as prisoners of war, and afterwards, by act of Congress, they were permitted to be kept at Fort Sill, Okla., and they are still there under the control and direction of the military branch of the Government. These Indians are really no more prisoners of war than we are. Many of them have been permitted to leave the reservation. The town of Vernon, where I live, is 50 miles from Fort Sill, and Geronimo was himself there very frequently. They have not been and are not now prisoners of war in the sense that we usually understand that term. I think that being prisoners of war in the way that they are is a benefit to them. They have to work, and they are more nearly civilized and command more respect among the people of that country than do the Comanche and the Kiowa Indians, among whom they live. I only wish that we had more such prisoners of war among our Indians than we have at the present time, if they would all be improved and forced to become industrious and self-sustaining like these Indians are who are under the military authorities at Fort Sill have become while they have been held—nominally only—as prisoners of war. They ran away from their homes on the Mescalero Reservation, in New Mexico, and went on the warpath under the leadership of Geronimo, and they should be now released as prisoners, returned to their old homes by Congress, and allotted lands on their old reservation, as they have not forfeited their rights there.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, this resolution comes up in a way that is somewhat remarkable to me. For the last two or three years I have been introducing resolutions and bills and attempting to get some action on this particular question. At this time, at my solicitation and on my bill, the War Department has made a report at great length and in great detail upon this identical question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] never has at any time darkened the door of the Committee on Indian Affairs and asked that this resolution be considered. I submit that the Committee on Indian Affairs at least ought to have the opportunity of looking at the resolution or of having it called up by its author.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I hope I may proceed a moment without interruption.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FERRIS. I will be very glad to yield later. The gentleman from Pennsylvania represents a Pennsylvania district, and he represents some people who have good motives and who want to do the right thing. I have not the least word of criticism to make against them. However, these Indians are located within 4 miles of my home, and I know the situation and I know the conditions and I think know something about what they need. To introduce a resolution coming from the angle that it does, which has never been presented to the Committee on Indian Affairs, that has never been called up by its author or submitted to anybody, is a procedure that I think the House would hardly want to adopt; and without attempting to oppose the merits of the resolution, I do say that when the War Department has reported and are struggling to make some disposion of this matter themselves, while the Interior Department now has a report partially drawn on legislation that accomplishes what the gentleman seeks to do, I myself being in favor of accomplishing what he seeks to do, such drastic and unusual action would, I think, at least be unnecessary.

I think the gentleman and I are thinking along precisely the same line, but what could be the purpose of inaugurating a scheme or a plan in this House to discharge committees when the author of the resolution had never suggested to the committee or never stepped inside the committee room asking that anything be done with his resolution, and I think the resolution ought to be voted down. I now yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Oklahoma that we have already voted to discharge the committee.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is correct about that, but I think they did it without full consideration or knowing the facts.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that. If the gentleman had made his statement before the motion was passed, I am satisfied the House would have voted against the motion to discharge the committee.

Mr. FERRIS. I think so.

Mr. NORRIS. And I suggest to the gentleman that the proper parliamentary procedure would be to move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. FERRIS. I intend to make that motion at the proper time.

Mr. NORRIS. The committee has been discharged, and then, if the House so desires, the resolution may go back to the committee, where, it seems to me from the gentleman's statement, it ought to go.

Mr. FERRIS. I intend to make that motion.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FERRIS. I do.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think under the rules of the House it is the duty of the committee to consider every inquiry resolution, which is a privileged resolution, regardless of whether somebody calls it up in the committee?

Mr. FERRIS. I am very loath to even debate the practice or custom of the rules of the House with the gentleman from Illinois, because in all frankness and candor I recognize the superiority of the gentleman over anybody on that proposition; but at the same time I want to appeal to his real knowledge of procedure, the way things are actually done, and I think he will agree with me when I say that no committee takes up matters unless somebody comes around and calls it to the attention of the chairman of the committee or comes himself and calls it up.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman from Oklahoma is mistaken about the practice.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I was for a while chairman of a committee and for a long time a member of a committee which invariably took notice itself of every privileged resolution which was referred to the committee, and either acted upon it within the six days required or knowingly let it go without action, so that it was privileged in the House, and it never waited for the author of the resolution to appear before the committee to ask for the consideration of the committee.

Mr. FERRIS. But the gentleman does not assume to say that course is pursued by any considerable number of committees?

Mr. MANN. I think that is the practice of the committees.

Mr. FERRIS. I will say that the committees I have been on have never pursued that course.

Mr. MANN. Well, they ought to change it.

Mr. FERRIS. Perhaps they should; I do not argue that; but I am only contending what my information had been on the subject.

Mr. PALMER. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have the floor. I was recognized when I made my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was recognized for an hour, if he desired that time.

Mr. PALMER. And I yielded to the gentleman from Oklahoma. I thought I was recognized in my own right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was recognized.

Mr. FERRIS. I desire to be recognized at the proper time to make my motion.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word in answer to what the gentleman from Oklahoma has said. I am not criticizing the conduct of the Committee on Indian Affairs in any way, and neither do I think it proper that any member of the Committee on Indian Affairs should criticize me for the way in which I have presented and pressed this resolution. I understand that the way in which I have done it is in strict accord with the practice in the House, certainly with the practice which has obtained during the short time I have been here. It is true that the ordinary bill or resolution which goes to a committee is followed up by its author, who appears before the committee and presses its consideration, but there is no duty on the part of the Member so to do. On the other hand, it is the duty of the committee to which the resolution is referred to take the matter up on its own initiative. That is the reason for which proposed legislation has been referred to the committees of the House, but in respect to resolutions of inquiry the practice here has been that, it being of a highly privileged character, after seven days the committee gives it consideration, or, on failure to give consideration, recognizes the fact that the Member who introduced the resolution may follow the matter to the floor, where it can be thrashed out.

And yet, with regard to a resolution of inquiry, I would not consider that it would be proper for a Member to make this motion on the floor without having taken the matter up with the committee. And therefore, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] will agree, I spoke to him as the chairman of the committee in reference to the resolution. He probably, in the press of other business before the committee, overlooked it, because it was not a matter about which there was any controversy or any contest. Everybody on the committee, so far as I know, is agreed that the information should be at hand, and everybody who is interested in this legislation agrees that this is the best if not the only proper way to secure that information.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] says that a report has already been made by the War Department giving this exact information to the committee. My only answer to that is that there are other Members in the House interested in this legislation besides the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the report from the War Department to that committee, kept within its own bosom and not communicated to other Members, will not reach the proposition which I have in view, and that is that all the Members of the House may be advised of the conditions in regard to these Indian prisoners, in order that when the several pieces of legislation affecting them come before the House Members may intelligently vote upon the question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. PALMER. I yield 19 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 19 minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I want to again state that this resolution has never been called to my attention. I have never heard of it before. I did not know it had ever been introduced, and I never saw it until this minute. Now, I greatly hope the House will not adopt this unusual course. However, I do not know that I have, or that I have not, any objection to its passage. Why not let this bill be referred to the committee from whence it came, and give them an opportunity to consider it—at least look at it—with instructions to rereport it at the expiration of seven days, the usual time? And at the proper time I want to make that motion.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] and to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] that I think there is clearly a misunderstanding as to why this resolution was not reported on by the committee. The committee meets on Monday, and I understand the House will adjourn to-day to meet on Monday. I would suggest that the gentleman should not press the passage of the resolution and give the committee until Monday to make a report.

Mr. PALMER. If the gentleman will permit, it is no reflection on the Committee on Indian Affairs to pass a resolution like this. The entire committee is agreed that the information ought to be obtained. I am not making any reflection upon the committee or criticizing it in any way. I just want to move the thing along. We have had the resolution in the House over a month, and, as the gentleman from South Dakota says, a report could be made in two or three days, and I take it, as all the members of the committee are agreeable to the proposition, it would be a favorable report. Why not then pass a resolution now and be done with it?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We meet on Monday——

Mr. FERRIS. Let me suggest that the War Department has already reported on legislation which will accomplish what the gentleman desires, and the report is in the committee now touching all the things the gentleman has asked for. He ought to advise himself and acquaint himself with the fact that the committee has been advised the report of the War Department is there, and the only thing that keeps the committee from acting now is that it affects two departments, viz, the War Department and the Interior Department. The Interior Department has not yet determined what the report should be.

Mr. PALMER. That is all right; but I want a report to the House.

Mr. MANN. If, as the gentleman states, there is now in the Committee on Indian Affairs a report which substantially complies with the request of the resolution, and that report of the Committee on Indian Affairs not being a House document and not printed for the benefit of the Members of the House, what possible objection is there to passing a resolution having the Secretary of War send the information to the House officially, so it could be printed, as it would be under such conditions, for the benefit of the Members of the House?

Mr. FERRIS. But, if the gentleman will permit me, I take it that the House does not want to do an idle thing. The Indian Committee has authority to accomplish legislation which will reach completely what the gentleman wants. This question concerns two departments of the Government, the Department of the Interior and the War Department, the War Department now having jurisdiction of the Indians, and the Department of the Interior must take jurisdiction where the War Department leaves off; it concerns both departments. The War Department has reported, and the report is there, which will be made public as soon as the committee reports the bill.

Mr. MANN. Are not the Members of the House entitled to the information before the bill is perfected and before the bill is reported? This simply asks for information, and if the resolution is passed the Secretary of War will send the information to the House and it will be printed for the benefit of the Members, so that they may have it in connection with the legislation—not after the legislation is reported, but before it is reported. What possible objection is there to asking for information concerning matters which may arise in legislation?

Mr. FERRIS. Perhaps none; but the answer to the gentleman's question ought to be conclusive when the fact is that the Committee on Indian Affairs never looked at this resolution. I did not know it was introduced until to-day, and the committee has taken no action on it whatever. They have never seen it or considered it a moment, and committees that are elected ought to have some mission to perform.

Mr. MANN. And yet it is the invariable practice of the House and of the committees of the House, where a resolution is introduced simply calling for information from a department which a Member desires to obtain, to report the resolution favorably; or, if committee does not act, the House passes the resolution, if the committee has not reported it, on the theory that Congress is entitled to any information from any of the departments which would throw light upon any proposed legislation. Now, what objection is there to passing the resolution and getting the information? It does not reflect upon the committee.

Mr. FERRIS. Not at all; but surely the committee has the right to have it called to their attention before they are discharged.

Mr. MANN. It does not reflect upon the action of the committee.

Mr. FERRIS. Not at all; but if the committee has all the information that the gentleman asks for, and is willing to give it to anybody on earth, what would be the use of passing another resolution and having the Secretary of War again report?

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, with instructions to report the same within five days.

The SPEAKER. What is the request which the gentleman makes?

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote formerly taken, and that this bill be rereferred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that that committee be instructed to report the same back within five days.

Mr. PALMER. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman is using my time. He was granted 19 minutes to debate this question, not to make a motion.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that that be done.

Mr. PALMER. I object to it.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained. The gentleman was recognized for the purpose of debate.

Mr. PALMER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] yielded 19 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. PALMER. I thought the gentleman was through.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask the gentleman what possible objection there can be to giving a committee of the House the benefit of what it knows about this matter?

Mr. PALMER. In theory, at least, the Committee on Indian Affairs has been considering this resolution since the 20th day of February, and that is plenty of time for a committee to consider a resolution concerning which there is no controversy and no contest. Nobody in the world has any objection to the passing of the resolution at some time. The only objection urged by the gentleman from Oklahoma seems to be that the author of the resolution did not come before his committee and press its immediate consideration.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman does not dispute that?

Mr. PALMER. No; the gentleman does not dispute that. I did not go before the Committee on Indian Affairs. I did not consider it to be a part of my duty to do so.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. FERRIS. I do.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma if the Committee on Indian Affairs has in its possession the information which the resolution calls for?

Mr. FERRIS. I think so. They have a long report on the subject.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If the committee would act upon it, they would probably report to the House the information that the resolution asks for, and thus accomplish the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. FERRIS. Precisely.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I can not understand, therefore, why the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] objects to allowing it to go over until Monday, say. I think the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] can assure the House that if the resolution does go over until Monday the committee will make a report on that day.

Mr. FERRIS. I am more anxious to have the War Department report printed than anybody in this House. It elaborates the situation exactly as it is, and I think it gives the information which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, at least, wants. I have no objection to the reporting of that information to the House, except that I do not approve of the course pursued by the gentleman toward a committee upon a matter of which he knows nothing. It is a course that ought not to be adopted.

Mr. PALMER. That is the practice universally adopted by Members desiring to secure information, and in view of my disclaimer of any intention or desire to reflect on the committee and the unanimous feeling all around that we ought to have this information, I think the resolution ought to be passed. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken; and at the suggestion of the Speaker, the House divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 93.

So the resolution was not agreed to.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the Committee on Indian Affairs was discharged from the consideration of House resolution 420 be vacated and that the resolution be again referred to that committee, with the understanding that a report be made thereon by Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] asks unanimous consent that the vote just taken on the resolution be vacated, and also the vote discharging the committee, and that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs with the understanding that they are to report not later than next Monday.

Mr. FERRIS. I think, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman had better give the committee a little more time, say five days.

Mr. PALMER. I am willing to allow 10 days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested here that the request embodied the last vote. That is not true, is it, that the last vote, taken by a standing vote was to be vacated? That is not true.

The SPEAKER. Of course both votes have to be vacated. If the last were vacated and the first were not you would be right back to the point where you started.

Mr. FERRIS. The request of the gentleman was to vacate the first vote, not the last one.

Mr. MANN. It had to be reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is dead unless both votes are vacated. If you vacate the last one without vacating the first one you are right at the point where you started.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WILSON of New York, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Frederick Lange, H. R. 30472, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 25, 1912.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, who in life and in death givest us the victory and in every experience leadest us in triumph in Christ, lighten the sorrows of our hearts this day, we pray Thee, that by Thy grace we may be more than conquerors through Him that loveth us. And unto Thee, whose grace is ready to help in time of need, will we render praise now and for evermore. Amen.

FRANK B. BRANDEGEE, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, took the chair as President pro tempore under the previous order of the Senate.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO. (S. DOC. NO. 454).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney General, transmitting, in reply to Senate resolution of March 16, 1912, information that it is not compatible with the public interests to lay before the Senate the information therein requested.

Mr. BACON. I desire that we may be informed what the reply is. We can not judge from the statement. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia desire to have the original resolution read?

Mr. BACON. I want to have the matter the reply concerns read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 250) adopted by the Senate March 16, 1912, as follows:

Whereas it is reported that there is pending before the Department of Justice a settlement between the United States and the International Harvester Co., by which the so-called Harvester Trust may be permitted to reorganize and to bring its organization and business within the Sherman antitrust law as construed by the Supreme Court: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, instructed to lay before the Senate all correspondence and information he may have upon this subject, together with any and all correspondence, information, and reports of the Bureau of Corporations relating thereto, from January 1, 1904, to the present time.

Mr. BACON. Now let the response be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the response of the Attorney General in full.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 19, 1912.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: I am in receipt of a copy of a resolution adopted by the Senate March 16, 1912, reading as follows:

"Whereas it is reported that there is pending before the Department of Justice a settlement between the United States and the International Harvester Co. by which the so-called Harvester Trust may be permitted to reorganize and to bring its organization and business within the Sherman antitrust law as construed by the Supreme Court: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, instructed to lay before the Senate all correspondence and information he may have upon this subject, together with any and all correspondence, information, and reports of the Bureau of Corporations relating thereto from January 1, 1904, to the present time."

In reply I am directed by the President to say that, in my opinion, it is not compatible with the public interests to lay before the Senate the correspondence and information relating to the International Harvester Co. in the possession of this department, nor the correspondence, information, and reports of the Bureau of Corporations relating thereto. These are matters pertaining entirely to business which is now pending and uncompleted in this department.

I have the honor to be,
Very respectfully, yours, GEO. W. WICKERSHAM, Attorney General.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not suppose that it would be a matter for discussion now, but I am unwilling for any such answer as that to be sent to the Senate of the United States by the head of one of the departments without its receiving an expression from at least one Senator that that officer entirely misunderstands his relation to this body, and that he has no right to send any such response to this body. If there are reasons, they ought to be communicated to the Senate in an entirely different way and in an entirely different tone.

The Senate of the United States has the right to ask for any paper in any executive office, and it has a right to have that paper produced or the reasons therefor communicated in a very different tone from that in which the Attorney General has seen fit to address to the Senate.

Mr. President, we have had this question discussed in the Senate before. It has been discussed in the Senate some 25 years ago, when probably there were present not more than one or two who are now Members of this body. The matter has been very fully discussed, both then and since then, and there has been an expression on the subject from those who antedated us, men than whom in learning and ability there have been none more prominent in this body in the last half century.

It is not the first time, Mr. President, that the Senate has directed the head of a department to furnish the Senate with information when it was not deemed expedient for that information to be furnished; but that fact was communicated to the Senate in a very different way. I recall myself an instance in which, during the Spanish War, I introduced a resolution which called for certain information from the War Department. Mr. Alger was Secretary of War at that time, and instead of returning such a response as that which we have just heard, the Secretary of War came personally to the Senate and called for the then chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who was Senator Hawley, of Connecticut, and for myself, the introducer of the resolution. We met him in the Marble Room, and he, in a quiet and proper way, gave us privately the reasons why it would be inexpedient that that information should be furnished and thus made public. We both of us recognized the propriety of the reasons given by him, and voluntarily—I say voluntarily—immediately we so signified to him, and I myself came back into the Senate and asked that the resolution be withdrawn.

Mr. President, that is the proper way for the head of a department to respond to such a requirement from the Senate, and that is the way in which it can be done with proper respect to the Senate and at the same time without anything being done which may be prejudicial to the public interests. If the Attorney General deemed that it was inexpedient that these matters should be made public, it was proper to have communicated to the Senate that fact in a very different tone from the letter which has been read.

Mr. President, the heads of departments have a very erroneous idea, some of them, as to what their relation is to the Congress of the United States. Their offices are not created by the Constitution. They derive no atom of power from the Executive. They are the creatures of the Congress of the United States. They do not exercise a power that is not given to them by the Congress of the United States. They do not possess a power that the Congress of the United States can not withdraw, and the more fully that fact is recognized the better for the relations which are to exist between Congress and the heads of these departments.

Mr. President, that is a response such as I have never before heard in the Chamber to a call for information from one of the departments. The Attorney General does not even go to the extent of saying that he had laid the matter before the President and the President did not deem it expedient to make the information public. If it had been laid before the President and the President did not deem it expedient, it was through the President that the information should have come to the Senate. It was proper for the President to send to the Senate the statement if in his opinion it was not expedient that the information was to be given and thus made public, and we would have all recognized the propriety of the President sending to us such a message. But it is not a proper message for the head of a department to send to the Senate.

Mark the language, Mr. President. It would have been bordering on discourtesy if he had said that the President had instructed him to say that in the opinion of the President it was not expedient. That would have been bordering on discourtesy, because that is a communication which should come to us not through the Attorney General but through the President. The President does not speak to Congress through one of his subordinates or through a subordinate officer. He does not do as a general of an army does when he issues a command to his subordinate in command and sends him a communication signed by the adjutant general.

I say it would have been very closely bordering on discourtesy if the Attorney General had made a response to the Senate saying that in the opinion of the President it was inexpedient. It would have been bordering on discourtesy, because that was a matter which should properly come to us through the mouth of the President and not through the mouth of the Attorney General, as in this case.

Mr BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a half a minute, until I finish the sentence. Here is a statement by the Attorney General that he is instructed by the President to say that in the opinion of him, the Attorney General, it is not expedient that this information should be furnished to the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, I think it very probable that there are reasons why it might be inexpedient to furnish it to the Senate, and why the information should not now be made public, and I think when those reasons are properly communicated to the Senate, if they exist, they would be recognized by the Senate, but this is not the way in which the reasons should be communicated to the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The language of the letter was evidently misunderstood, and I should like to ask that that portion of the letter be reread in which the Attorney General refers to the President. We misunderstood it over here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield for that purpose?

Mr. BACON. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the portion of the communication referred to by the Senator from Idaho.

The Secretary read as follows:

I am in receipt of a copy of a resolution adopted by the Senate. * * * In reply, I am directed by the President to say that, in my opinion, it is not compatible with the public interests to lay before the Senate the correspondence and information relating, etc.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Idaho is satisfied that I was not mistaken as to the language.

Mr. BORAH. I misunderstood the language, and that is the reason why I asked for the reading. Is the language "in my opinion" in quotations?

Mr. BACON. No; it is not. It is simply a cloak under which the Attorney General did not have quite the nerve to state to the Senate that in his opinion it was not expedient.

Mr. BORAH. I was at a loss to know how the President would instruct the Attorney General to act in the opinion of the Attorney General.

Mr. BACON. It is rather a curious and anomalous thing.

As I said, I did not intend when I rose to do more than enter my protest, because I am not willing that even one day or one-half minute shall pass whenever we get such a communication from the head of a department without stamping it right at the time.

Mr. President, it has been suggested to me by certain Senators that I should move that the Senate do not receive the communication. I will not go to that extent. I say this in no personal unkindness to the Attorney General, for, on the contrary, I have the kindest personal and official relations with him, but it would matter not if he were my brother. If there is one thing for which I propose to stand as long as I have the privilege and honor of being a Member of this body it is for what I consider to be the dignity and power and prerogatives and rights of the Senate, and I do not propose for myself to pass them by unnoticed whenever they are attacked, let the attack come from whence it may.

Mr. LEA. I move that the response of the Attorney General be printed and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Resolved, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate a detailed statement of the number of carriages, vehicles, motor cycles, motor vehicles, and automobiles now owned by the Government or maintained at Government expense in the Government Printing Office, and the purpose for which each individual carriage or vehicle is used, and the make of the car, if a motor car; also to report to the Senate the number of Government employees who are employed or detailed as chauffeurs, drivers, or footmen for such carriages and automobiles, and how much of the time of these respective Government employees is devoted to that particular work; also to report to whom each such carriage or automobile is assigned.

Mr. BRISTOW submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 264), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Comissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to furnish the Senate a detailed statement of the number of carriages, vehicles, motor cycles, motor vehicles, and automobiles now owned by the Government or maintained at Government expense by the District of Columbia, and the purpose for which each individual carriage or vehicle is used, and the make of the car, if a motor car; also to report to the Senate the number of Government employees who are employed or detailed as chauffeurs, drivers, or footmen for such carriages and automobiles, and how much of the time of these respective Government employees is devoted to that particular work; also to report to whom each such carriage or automobile is assigned.

Mr. BRISTOW submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 265), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Civil Service Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate a detailed statement of the number of carriages, vehicles, motor cycles, motor vehicles, and automobiles now owned by the Government or maintained at Government expense by the Civil Service Commission, and the purpose for which each individual carriage or vehicle is used, and the make of the car, if a motor car; also to report to the Senate the number of Government employees who are employed or detailed as chauffeurs, drivers, or footmen for such carriages and automobiles, and how much of the time of these respective Government employees is devoted to that particular work; also to report to whom each such carriage or automobile is assigned.

THE METAL-MINING INDUSTRIES.

Mr. SMOOT submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 266), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas the metalliferous mining States of the West were for many years urging the creation of a bureau of mines, through which investigations might be conducted with a view to the upbuilding of the mining industry; and

Whereas, nothwithstanding the creation of the Bureau of Mines, the metalliferous mining industry has not kept pace with the general advancement in agriculture and other productive enterprises: Now therefore

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the Senate:

First. What work is being done by the Bureau of Mines in behalf of the metal-mining industries in the public-land States west of the Mississippi River.

Second. What work, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, should be carried on by the Bureau of Mines in these States, and how such work can best be conducted.

Third. An estimate as to the cost of such work as the Secretary of the Interior shall recommend to be carried on by the Bureau of Mines in that region during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

REPORT OF NATIONAL WATERWAYS COMMISSION.

On motion of Mr. BURTON, it was Ordered, That there be printed 1,000 copies of the final report of the United States National Waterways Commission, with appendices thereto.

ADDRESS, ETC., OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN (S. DOC. NO. 439).

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact that on Tuesday, March 19, I presented to the Senate and asked to have printed as a Senate document certain state papers of President Lincoln, together with his Gettysburg address. The order was entered and the document was printed, but through some inadvertence the copies furnished in the pamphlet which I left at the Secretary's desk contained the Gettysburg address in an incomplete and inaccurate form. I now submit the complete and accurate address and ask that it, together with the other papers, be reprinted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the order will be entered.

The order as agreed to was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That Senate Document No. 439, Sixty-second Congress, second session, "Abraham Lincoln," first and second inaugural addresses; message, July 5, 1861; proclamation, January 1, 1863; and Gettysburg address, November 19, 1863, be reprinted with corrections.

DR. HARVEY W. WILEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over under the rule, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 256), submitted by Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey on the 22d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has learned with much regret of the resignation of Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, head of the Pure Food Bureau of the United States Government. We feel that his services while at the head of that department have been of incalculable value to the American people, and take this opportunity to express our confidence in his great ability and the splendid service he has rendered to this country.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I move the adoption of the resolution. I feel that if ever a citizen deserved commendation——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to inquire of the Presiding Officer whether or not that motion is routine morning business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution came over under the rule, having been offered on Friday last. The Chair assumes that it is routine morning business.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think it can come within the designation "routine morning business."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that it does.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course, if that is the ruling of the Chair——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I trust, Mr. President, that we may have an expression of the Senate upon that resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have no desire to cut off discussion.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not want to discuss it; but it seems to me it should appeal to everyone.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not think, to be perfectly frank, that the resolution is one that should be passed by the Senate. That is my judgment about it. I do not think the resignation of an officer of that character is such a proposition and is of such dignity as to call for a resolution of this kind by the Senate.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I regret that I can not agree with the distinguished Senator, though, of course, I must yield to his parliamentary and senatorial experience. I am new, but I did feel that if there ever was a case where the commendation of his fellow citizens and of this body particularly should go to a man it was in this case. I feel that Dr. Wiley has done quite as much for his country and for humanity as a general in battle or an admiral at sea, and I trust that we may have an expression of the Senate on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I inquire if the morning business has been concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further concurrent or other resolutions? If not, the morning business is concluded.

Mr. REED. Before morning business is closed, there is a considerable demand——

Mr. HEYBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to know whether or not I am correct in thinking that the Chair has announced that morning business has been concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announced that morning business was concluded, and then recognized the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HEYBURN. But, Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent agreement no one may be recognized except for the purpose of taking up the business of the hour; and I rose and addressed the Chair for the purpose of asking that the Presiding Officer lay before the Senate Order of Business No. 299.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the order which automatically is before the Senate under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is proper to start it automatically.

Mr. REED. I yielded to the Senator from Idaho, I supposed, for an interrogatory. I do not know that the Senator has any knowledge of why I took the floor. I have not been permitted to announce it, and I should like to have that privilege graciously accorded me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho rose to a question of order. With the permission of the Senator from Missouri the Chair will ask the Secretary to read the unanimous-consent agreement under which the Senate is now acting.

The SECRETARY. On March 5 last it was agreed by unanimous consent that on Monday, March 25, 1912, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 299, in relation to the right of the Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. STEPHENSON, to a seat in the Senate; and that before adjournment on that legislative day a vote will be taken upon the motion of Mr. HEYBURN that the Senate agree to the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, declaring that in the opinion of the said committee the charges preferred by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin against ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, were not sustained and that the election of said ISAAC STEPHENSON as a Senator of the United States was not procured by corrupt methods or practices, and upon any amendment that may then be pending or offered to such motion.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, upon that particular topic I desire to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, some discussion has been had regarding this controversy. It has been thus far of an illuminating character, and were it not for the positions which I understand are taken by some of the Senators, and for the remarkable opinions expressed by a portion of the committee in the several reports, I would not ask the Senate to listen to anything I might have to say. But, if I correctly understand these reports, it is sought to commit the Senate to a doctrine which, in my judgment, will open the door to wholesale fraud and grant the sanction of a senatorial decision to a policy which, if thus approved, will result in a condition unspeakable.

By way of preliminary, and because I think it is pertinent to the issues here to be considered, I desire to remark that the personality of the man whose acts are under investigation may well be considered. I have heard it intimated that the enormous amount of money proven and admitted to have been expended and the corruption shown are to be charitably viewed because the Senator from Wisconsin is a man of slight experience, who was overreached and mayhap imposed upon and plundered by those who were conducting his campaign. What is the fact?

The Congressional Directory gives us a little light. Here is a man who has engaged extensively in the lumber business; he has also been a farmer and a banker. It is a matter of general knowledge, and may be said without fear of contradiction, that here is a gentleman with as wide a range of business experience as is possessed by any man in the Senate. He comes here with that experience and that knowledge gained from contests in the great business world successfully conducted.

He is not a novice in politics. This is not his first venture in the political field. It is recorded in the Directory that he has held various local public offices. The years are not given nor the offices named, but whatever the offices were and how long held, they could hardly have been acquired without some political experience being gained at the same time.

But it is further recorded that he was a Member of the Forty-eighth, the Forty-ninth, and the Fiftieth Congresses; that he was elected to the Senate in 1907 and again in 1909. So you have here a man of wide business knowledge and of extensive political experience. We are not dealing with a novice.

It, therefore, does not lie in the mouth of any man to claim that the acts done by the Senator from Wisconsin should be palliated, excused, or mitigated on the plea of ignorance, neither should the true import of his conduct be obscured by the pretense that he was overreached by designing men. On the contrary, his long knowledge of the conduct of elections, his intimate acquaintance with matters political and matters of business, point rather toward that shrewdness which comes from experience and which leads men to seek to accomplish through the agency of others that which they prefer not to do themselves directly.

Viewed in this proper light, we can therefore probably understand why it is that this campaign, which we are now about to consider, was organized in the most peculiar and remarkable way, and why it is that the Senator from Wisconsin committed the entire campaign to certain financial agents. I shall refer to them a little later on. But I pass for the present to a consideration of what I consider the issue now before the Senate for settlement.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections consists of certain men, all of whom took part in this proceeding, I think, save one, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER]. So far as I am aware he did not sit or act, and his name does not appear to any report. There are, in fact, four reports before us. There is a general report signed by Senators DILLINGHAM, GAMBLE, HEYBURN, SUTHERLAND, OLIVER, JOHNSTON of Alabama, FLETCHER, POMERENE, and BRADLEY, in which the general finding is set forth that the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON was not procured by corrupt methods or practices. But it is set forth in the proceedings of the committee itself—Senators will find it on page 2—that Mr. HEYBURN was instructed to report the action of the Committee to the Senate, together with a transcript of all the proceedings before the whole committee and also the individual views presented by members of the committee.

Whether that was intended to be an approval of the individual views presented I know not, but there was no protest against these views filed, save as I shall now state.

The Senator from Idaho presented his views in a document; the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Ohio presented their views in a separate document; and then following that Senators JONES, CLAPP, KENYON, KERN, and LEA presented a minority report.

Now, I desire to get before the Senate what is the finding of the majority of the committee. No man finding generally that these charges should not be sustained gave any reasoning for his finding except the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the five Senators who signed a minority report holding that the seat is not properly occupied.

Now, if the Senate please, I challenge attention to this statement in the report of the Senator from Idaho, and I shall show you that this statement is concurred in by a majority of the committee and that no man upon the committee expressly denies its accuracy. I quote:

> The amount of money expended by Mr. STEPHENSON, Mr. Cook, Mr. Hatton, and Mr. McGovern in the primary campaign was so extravagant and the expenditures made by and on behalf of these gentlemen were made with such reckless disregard of propriety as to justify the sharpest criticism.

I challenge attention to this language. I challenge the attention of every man who intends to vote upon this proposition to this finding of fact and the conclusion from the facts:

> Such expenditures were in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of government, which contemplated the selection of candidates by the electors and not the selection of the electors by the candidate.

That language, thus condemning the methods used, is taken under consideration by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Utah in their report.

They concur in it absolutely and without qualification. Before I discuss that concurrence, although I must break the thread of what I have been saying, I call attention to the fact that in his report the Senator from Idaho makes this statement:

> Were it possible to hold that Mr. STEPHENSON was subject to the same restrictions under the laws of Wisconsin as a candidate for a State office we would feel compelled to enter more fully upon the nature and character of the expenditures made by him and on his behalf during the primary campaign.

Later in his report, at page 19, you will find this language:

> Were a candidate for a State office in Wisconsin to conduct a campaign in the manner in which the campaigns of Mr. STEPHENSON and of other men who sought election to the United States Senate were conducted it would be very difficult to justify such conduct under the laws of the State.

In that language the Senator from Ohio, as I have stated, and the Senator from Utah concur. They quote it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, my attention was distracted for a moment. What was the last quotation which the Senator read? May I trouble him to repeat it?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

> Were a candidate for a State office in Wisconsin to conduct a campaign in the manner in which the campaigns of Mr. STEPHENSON and of other men who sought election to the United States Senate were conducted it would be very difficult to justify such conduct under the laws of the State.

I think I may say here that I am uncertain whether the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Ohio concurred in that particular phrase. They did concur in the other language which I read. I take it that is what the Senator rose to say, and I was perhaps guilty of an inadvertence in charging that he approved that particular language.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator is right in saying the Senator from Ohio and myself concurred in the first statement but not the second. As the Senator from Missouri has examined this record, will he permit me to ask him what law of the State he finds was violated by Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. REED. I am going to discuss that later on, in order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well.

Mr. REED. And I prefer to do it as I arrive at it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me to inquire as to a statement made a few moments ago? The Senator from Missouri was reading this language:

Such expenditures were in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of Government, which contemplated the selection of candidates by the electors and not the selection of the electors by the candidate.

The Senator paused after reading the first portion of that sentence, as though I intended to say such expenditures were in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of Government, and he stopped there. The manner in which the Senator read it might leave that impression upon the minds of those who heard it. I limited it to the one proposition following. I did not say it was a subversion of the principles of our Government; I said it was a subversion of the one principle of the Government which I enumerated in the same paragraph.

Mr. REED. I am not aware of any peculiarity in the way I read the statement.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was only——

Mr. REED. But lest there might be any misunderstanding, and because I want to be entirely fair with the Senator from Idaho, I will read it again, and if I do not read it with proper accent and punctuation, I shall be glad to turn the job over to somebody else.

Were it possible to hold that Mr. STEPHENSON was subject to the same restrictions under the laws of Wisconsin——

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not refer to that part of it. I made no reference to that part of it.

Mr. REED. I prefer reading it altogether. It sounds better.

Mr. HEYBURN. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President. A few days since my attention was called to a statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which said, "Laughter in the galleries." There were two mistakes. One was the laughter in the galleries and the other was a violation of the rules of this body in putting it in the RECORD. I trust it will not have occasion to occur in the RECORD or that it will not appear there. Now, I am merely calling the Senator's attention——

Mr. REED. I concur with the Senator and consent that not only the laughter in the galleries but the galleries shall be omitted from the RECORD.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, just a moment. I am not speaking in levity. The Senator commenced to read after the paragraph to which I referred. I will leave him to straighten it out to suit himself.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President, I commenced to read before the paragraph to which the Senator referred and I am coming to it in due order.

I will proceed again, beginning with the top of page 18 of Senate Document 349, the report presented by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]:

Were it possible to hold that Mr. STEPHENSON was subject to the same restrictions under the laws of Wisconsin as a candidate for a State office, we would feel compelled to enter more fully upon the nature and character of the expenditures made by him and on his behalf during the primary campaign.

The amount of money expended by Mr. STEPHENSON, Mr. Cook, Mr. Hatton, and Mr. McGovern in the primary campaign was so extravagant and the expenditures made by and on behalf of these gentlemen were made with such reckless disregard of propriety as to justify the sharpest criticism.

Such expenditures were in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of government, which contemplated the selection of candidates by the electors and not the selection of the electors by the candidates.

Regardless of any statute requiring that strict accounts be kept of money expended by and on behalf of candidates, a candidate and every man representing him should know that public opinion would expect the parties to place and maintain themselves in a position so that if any of their acts were questioned they could justify such acts to the extent of giving every detail in regard thereto.

While I do not believe that the law of Wisconsin could constitute any man a candidate or place him in the position of and under the responsibilities of a candidate for an office over which the State had no control and which was not to be filled under any law of the State, yet I feel impelled to criticize the acts of those in charge of the expenditure of the money of men who are called candidates for the Senate, and especially of Mr. STEPHENSON, in the irresponsible and reckless manner in which they disbursed the money furnished them by Mr. STEPHENSON during the period of the primary campaign.

Later occurs the phrase:

Were a candidate for a State office in Wisconsin to conduct a campaign in the manner in which the campaign of Mr. STEVENSON, and of other men who sought election to the United States Senate, were conducted, it would be very difficult to justify such conduct under the laws of the State.

Mr. President, I am sorry my friend the Senator from Idaho has gone, because I am now entirely in the dark as to whether I read this in a manner quite suitable to him.

That language, except the last clause which I read, is concurred in and agreed to by Senator POMERENE and Senator SUTHERLAND. They will pardon me for calling their names in this direct way. That language is agreed to by five other members of the committee. So a majority of the committee have solemnly found the fact. Thus the question which is presented to the Senate of the United States for decision now is whether a man can take and hold a seat in the United States Senate who has been guilty of such conduct in securing his election as to "violate the fundamental principles underlying our system of government." Those who desire to support the majority report either are obliged to vote for that proposition, baldly and nakedly stated, or else they must repudiate the conclusion of fact arrived at by the majority of the members of the committee.

No man up to the present hour has risen upon this floor to challenge the correctness of the conclusion of fact arrived at by the majority of the committee. I question whether any man will.

Another important fact to consider is that the three members of the subcommittee who heard the evidence and looked the witnesses in the face had an opportunity to weigh and determine the value of the evidence which was superior to the opportunity possessed by the ordinary member of the committee who merely read the record. Three of those members of the subcommittee join in the conclusions I have read. The fourth member, who sat but little, simply joins in the majority report. Thus we have the advantage of three members of the subcommittee, all of them, in fact, who heard all the evidence, joining in the conclusion I am discussing. I say again, dodge the issue as we may, seek to avoid it as we may, we are going to cast our votes here in the Senate upon this bald, naked proposition, Can a man acquire a seat in the United States Senate and hold it who has been guilty of such conduct and has so expended his money that he has violated the fundamental principles underlying our system of Government?

Senators may make their choice, Senators may vote as they see fit, but as for myself, if I ever find that with my eyes open and a knowledge of the fact I am deliberately voting for a man who secured his seat by means that were violative of the fundamental principles underlying our system of government, then I shall feel that I have placed a strange estimate upon the dignity and importance of this body and shall have rendered a strange service to my country.

The Senator from Idaho justifies his position by this sort of logic, which you will find running throughout his report and throughout his speeches, namely, that a Senator in his election is not subject in any manner to the laws of the State from which he comes as a representative. That is clearly set forth in the language that I have read, but it appears elsewhere in his speeches.

The Senator from Idaho claims that no law has been passed by the State and that no law can be passed by a State affecting or regulating the election of a United States Senator. That presents an interesting question, or rather two questions. First, do the laws of the State of Wisconsin apply or can the laws of any State apply in such matters; and, second, if there be no law of a State that applies, is the Senate therefore without power or jurisdiction to inquire into any of those acts by which a man gains his seat in this body?

Stated differently, the question is this: Can a man be barred from a seat in the United States Senate by any act, however immoral in its nature, however dangerous to society, however violative of public policy, however pregnant with moral turpitude, however stained with infamy, unless that act is expressly prohibited by statute law? If that proposition is conceded, if it is conceded that a man can not be barred unless he has absolutely violated a law, then the Senator from Idaho is right in his conclusion; but if we are not bound to find a law expressly prohibiting an act or making it felonious, then the Senator from Idaho is wrong in his conclusion.

Now, let us examine the proposition. It is that unless ISAAC STEPHENSON violated the statute laws of the State of Wisconsin, the criminal statutes of that State, he has a right to his seat here, no matter whether his acts were subversive of the very principles upon which our Government is founded. In plain English, that proposition, Mr. President, means that unless a man has qualified himself for the penitentiary he is not disqualified for the United States Senate. There is no middle ground. The acts must have been actually prohibited by the criminal statutes of the State or else they are permissible. A man must be a criminal or he may be a Senator. Nothing bars him from the Senate which does not admit him to jail. The two realms are divided by the thinnest kind of a statutory line. In my judgment, that theory places the penitentiary and the United States Senate too close together for either comfort or respectability. I maintain that it is not a true doctrine, and it is not in accordance with precedents, with example, or with reason.

Let me submit first this observation: I make the bald statement that that kind of a doctrine destroys the power of the Senate to itself decide upon the qualification of its Members, and why? Because the right to hold the office is no longer dependent upon the sense of the Senate as to what is right and proper, but it is dependent upon the laws of different States. If a man is to be barred because he has violated a statute of his State, and only because he has violated a statute of a State, then, as no two States have the same laws, we have as many different yardsticks by which to measure a man's right to sit here as there are States in the Union. One State has very stringent laws against corrupt practices; another State has no laws against corrupt practices; and, therefore, when we come to decide a case that is brought here to us, if the man comes from a State that has stringent laws against corrupt practices he would be ousted, although another man from another State might come here having committed the same character of acts, and a thousand times as many of those acts, and he would be entitled to his seat. The judgment of the Senate of the United States as to what is right is not the rule by which we govern ourselves under those circumstances, but we are governed by the laws of 48 different States, and we have 48 different moral yardsticks by which we are to measure the qualifications of a man seeking a seat here.

To extend that argument a little further, and to show how utterly foolish and wrong it is to accept it, we can easily imagine one State, where there is a stringent law against bribery, and another State, where there might even be no law against bribery, or a law so loosely drawn that it would be of no binding force to cover acts such as might result in a man being corruptly sent to the United States Senate. Then, if we are not ourselves to judge, but are simply as a court of law to decide the question of guilty or not guilty, applying the statutes of the States, we would in one case be compelled to receive a man who had been guilty of every kind of misconduct, while in the other case we would exclude a man whose offenses had been slight. Manifestly, therefore, the Senate of the United States can not and will not govern itself in determining the qualifications of its Members by the question of the stringency or the looseness of the laws of a State from which a Senator may come.

But I observe in the next place, Mr. President, that this doctrine, carried to its legitimate conclusion, would even permit a man to come here by the very bribery of members of the legislature, for, says the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], in the election of Senators to this body the State is without jurisdiction to control, and therefore State statutes could not bind, and as there is no Federal statute against the bribing of members of the legislatures of the various States—and it is doubtful whether one could be passed—we are confronted by the proposition that a man might, if the theory of the Senator from Idaho be correct, sit in this body who had actually bought his way here by direct bribery of members of the legislature; yet such has never been the doctrine of the Senate. Said the Senator from Idaho:

> But the legislature has no power to regulate in any manner or to any extent the election of a United States Senator. There is no such proceeding known under any law of the United States as the nomination of a candidate for the United States Senate. * * * There is no law of the United States recognizing such a thing as a candidate for the United States Senate, and no legal status is given to the frame of mind constituting an intention on the part of a man or his friends that he become a candidate before the legislature. The matter of choosing Senators rests solely with the legislature, and under existing laws one legislature can not dictate the rule governing a subsequent legislature.

Now, as I understand, Senators POMERENE and SUTHERLAND take the view that this election was conducted in an iniquitous manner—and I would not misstate their position under any circumstances—but they take the further view, if I understand them correctly, that these acts which were committed, and which are condemned, were not brought home to the Senator from Wisconsin, so that he might in a court of criminal jurisdiction be held criminally for them. Therefore, they take the view that he can not be ousted from the position thus gained. If that be not their position, then I am unable to understand it. Certainly in language that is burning with indignation and expressing a high concern for the country's weal, these two able Senators do condemn this conduct and this use of money, and yet find that the seat shall be occupied.

I make the assertion, Mr. President, that the true rule, the rule that must govern in matters of this kind, is that whenever a man, in order to secure his election, has resorted to trickery, fraud, corruption, and evil practices, so that to permit his election to stand would be injurious to the Nation and violative of public policy, then the seat thus obtained can not be retained. I think this position is sound and is sustained by the Constitution itself. It is provided in section 4 of Article I:

> SEC. 4. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Section 5 provides:

> SEC. 5. Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.
> Each House may, * * * with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member.

These sections place in the Senate the broad right of determing the question. Its power is limited by no rule of law. Its right is limited by no clause of the Constitution. Senators in passing judgment are limited by nothing except their sense of duty to the country and to the body of which they are Members.

I contend, further, that the legislatures of the States do have the right to prescribe how Senators shall be elected, in every respect and in every particular save and except where those rights have been limited by the provisions of section 4 of Article I of the Constitution and by Federal statutes passed in pursuance thereof. An examination of those statutes will show that Congress has done nothing more than to determine the time and manner of casting the votes by the members of the legislature, but at no place except as stated have we by Federal statute or Federal Constitution limited the rights reserved in section 4, Article I, to the legislatures of the States, namely:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

Under the organic law of every State the right is reserved to the State to create its own legislature. The States elect their legislatures as they see fit, for such terms as they see fit, and confer upon them such powers as they choose. They nominate the members of their general assemblies at such times and in such way as they deem advisable. The Federal Government has confined itself to merely declaring when the members of the legislature shall vote for United States Senator and how the votes shall be counted, and so forth. So that I maintain, as a primary and fundamental fact, not to be lost sight of in this argument, that the State of Wisconsin did have the right to provide for the election of members of the legislature and to provide a method for instructing their agents thus to be selected what the people who elect them desire them to do. If the legislature refuse to obey the instructions, probably there was and is no means of compelling obedience, except to hold them liable for a violation of instructions and breach of faith.

But I return now to the other proposition which I was discussing a few moments ago. I affirm that law, precedent, and common sense all sustain the doctrine that when this body is passing upon the qualifications of a man claiming a seat in the Senate it is not bound in its decision by the fact that the State from which he comes may have failed to pass laws prohibiting the acts complained of.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCLEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. It may be that the Senator is right. The Senate itself may not be bound by any statute which a State may pass, but I want to inquire of him if it is not his judgment that when a citizen of a State becomes a candidate for a seat in this body he is under some obligation to obey the laws of that State, and have not we the right to inquire into the question whether or not he has violated the laws of his own State respecting the method of his nomination and election?

Mr. REED. Undoubtedly. My argument does not conflict with that, but rather is consistent with it. I maintain that whenever a man, in order to acquire a seat in the United States Senate, has violated those doctrines which are necessary for the preservation of the country and for keeping pure the fountains of the law, of which the Senate is one, he can be barred from a seat here though he has violated no statute law. If he has violated a statute law so much the worse for him.

I was saying, Mr. President, that the power of the Senate to judge of the qualifications of its Members is so broad and comprehensive that it is not and can not be circumscribed by the statute of a State.

The failure of a State to pass a statute does not bar us from considering improper acts. If a State has passed a statute and it has been violated, that is a very potential fact for us to consider in determining the character of the applicant for admission here; but if the State has passed no law or if no statute law has been violated, still the Senate must judge of the act and must determine according to the justice and the right of the matter whether the act was or was not so contrary to public policy, inherently bad, as to demand its condemnation.

I call the Senate's attention to Story on Constitutional Law, fourth edition, volume 1, paragraph 833:

It is obvious that a power must be lodged somewhere to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of the members of each house composing the legislature, for otherwise, there could be no certainty as to who were legitimately chosen members, and any intruder or usurper might claim a seat, and thus trample upon the rights and privileges and liberties of the people. Indeed, elections would become, under such circumstances, a mere mockery, and legislation the exercise of sovereignty by any self-constituted body. The only possible question on such a subject is as to the body in which such a power shall be lodged. If lodged in any other than the legislative body itself, its independence, its purity, and even its existence and action may be destroyed or put into imminent danger. No other body but itself can have the same motives to preserve and perpetuate these attributes; no other body can be so perpetually watchful to guard its own rights and privileges from infringement, to purify and vindicate its own character, and to preserve the rights and sustain the free choice of its constituents. Accordingly, the power has always been lodged in the legislative body by the uniform practice of England and America.

I call attention to this particular language:

The only possible question on such a subject is as to the body in which such a power shall be lodged. If lodged in any other than the legislative body itself, its independence, its purity, and even its existence and action may be destroyed or put into imminent danger.

And yet the theory of the committee, or that portion of it that concurred in the views I am discussing, is that this right is lodged, not in the Senate, but in the various State legislatures, because, say they, unless you have violated a rule made by the State legislature you are entitled to your seat here, although your conduct may be subversive of the very fundamentals upon which our governmental structure is based.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Missouri has been talking for the last 10 or 15 minutes to combat the proposition that a Senator can not be deprived of his seat in the Senate unless he has violated some State law. I do not know of anybody who has made any such contention. I do not. I would be glad if the Senator from Missouri would call our attention to some language in the views of the majority which bears out that statement.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I will come to that in a moment. I should prefer to finish my observations regarding that principle, so that they may appear in the RECORD in a somewhat logical form.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. When I finish the sentence I will yield. I prefer to finish the authorities upon this branch of the argument which I am attempting to make, and I should be very glad then to advise the Senator from Utah why I have seen fit to take the time of the Senate to combat these views.

I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BROWN. Whether or not the proposition of law is correct—in my opinion the Senator states it soundly—that a Senator must violate a State statute before we can unseat him may be an interesting question to discuss and consider in connection with elections generally, as a matter of fact in the case at bar does not the Senator think the record shows that the sitting Member [Mr. STEPHENSON] did violate the statutes of his State?

Mr. REED. Senators think faster than I can talk. I am coming to that point, and I will give my views upon it. I thank the Senator, however, for the suggestion, and I will try to reach both of these matters in due course.

Mr. President, the right of the Senate to expel a Member is found in the same section of the Constitution that I have just been discussing; that is, the section giving the Senate the right to judge of the qualifications of its Members also contains the provision allowing it to unseat them. In neither case is any rule laid down. In both cases we have the broad, general language. I think, therefore, that decisions relating to the expulsion of Members are pertinent and furnish good authority upon the question now under discussion, and to that end I want to call the attention of the Senate to a very early case. I quote from Sergeant on Constitutional Law, pages 301 and 302. I refer to the case of William Blount, a somewhat celebrated controversy, and I find this:

William Blount was expelled from the Senate of the United States on the 8th of July, 1797, being declared in the resolution of the Senate guilty of a high misdemeanor entirely inconsistent with his public trust and duty as a Senator. He was then under an impeachment by the House of Representatives, which terminated in the decision that a Senator was not liable to impeachment. The report of the committee in his case, as adopted by the Senate, stated as reasons for the expulsion his writing a letter evincing his attempts to seduce from his duty an United States Indian interpreter and to employ him as an engine to alienate the affections and confidence of the Indians from the public officers residing among them; the measures he had proposed to excite a temper which must produce the recall or expulsion of our superintendent from the Creek Nation; his insidious advice, tending to the advancement of his own popularity and consequence at the expense and hazard of the good opinion which the Indians entertain of this Government, and of the treaties subsisting between us and them, and concluding that the committee had no doubt but that his conduct had been inconsistent with his public duties, rendered him unworthy of a further continuance of his present public trust in that body and amounted to a high misdemeanor. On this case it has been also remarked that the Member implicated was called upon, in the first instance, to answer whether he was the author of a letter, the copy of which was only produced and the writing of which was the cause of the expulsion. He was afterwards requested to declare whether he was the author of the letter itself, and declining in both cases to answer, the fact of his having written it was established by a comparison of his handwriting and by the belief of persons who had seen him write, upon inspection of the letter. These, it is argued, show the admission of a species of evidence which in courts of criminal jurisdiction would be excluded; yet, in the resolution, the Senate declared him guilty of a high misdemeanor, though no presentment or indictment had been found against him and no prosecution at law was ever commenced upon the case. And it seems no law existed to authorize such prosecution.

In connection with the Blount case I call attention to the case of John Smith. He was a Senator from the State of Ohio. He was accused of treason. But his treason was in connection with that of Burr, who was the principal. Burr was acquitted upon the ground that he had not violated any statute of the United States, and thereupon a nolle pros was entered in Smith's case. The matter was brought before Congress, and it was squarely argued and squarely maintained that as no statute law had been violated Smith was entitled to retain his seat. Let me take just a few moments of the time of the Senate to quote the language of a distinguished American statesman. The report in that case was made by Mr. John Quincy Adams, and his language is worthy of consideration.

Mr. Adams declares (p. 460):

Nor have they (the committee) conceived themselves bound in this inquiry by any other rules than natural justice and equity due to a brother Senator on the one part and their country on the other.

It appeared that Smith made the plea that—he was solitary, friendless, and unskilled in contending for his rights, and that senatorial privileges might, by reason of his unskillfulness, be denied him.

To this plea the committee, speaking through Mr. Adams, replied:

They (the Senators) should hold it a sacred obligation to themselves and to their fellow Senators and to their country to meet them by direct, unconditional acknowledgment or denial, without seeking a refuge from the broad face of day in the labyrinth of technical forms.

In examining the question whether these forms of judicial proceedings or the rules of judicial evidence ought to be applied to the exercise of that censorial authority, which the Senate of the United States possesses over the conduct of its Members, let us assume as the test of their application, either the dictates of unfettered reason, the letter and spirit of the Constitution, or precedents, domestic or foreign, and your committee believe that the result will be the same; that the power of expelling a Member must in its nature be discretionary and in its exercise always more summary than the tardy process of judicial tribunals.

The power of expelling a Member for misconduct results, on the principles of common sense, from the interests of the Nation, that the high trust of legislation should be invested in pure hands. When the trust is elective, it is not to be presumed that the constituent body will commit the deposit to the keeping of worthless characters. But when a man, whom his fellow citizens have honored with their confidence on the pledge of a spotless reputation, has degraded himself by the commission of infamous crimes, which becomes suddenly and unexpectedly revealed to the world, defective, indeed, would be that institution which should be impotent to discard from its bosom the contagion of such a member, which should have no remedy of amputation to apply until the poison had reached the heart.

The question upon the trial of a criminal cause before the courts of common law is not between guilt and innocence, but between guilt and the possibility of innocence. If a doubt can possibly be raised, either by the ingenuity of the party or of his counsel or by the operation of general rules in their unforeseen application to particular cases, that doubt must be decisive for acquittal; and the verdict of not guilty, perhaps in nine cases out of ten, means no more than that the guilt of the party has not been demonstrated in the precise, specific, and narrow forms prescribed by law. The humane spirit of the laws multiplies the barriers for the protection of innocence, and freely admits that these barriers may be abused for the shelter of guilt. It avows a strong partiality favorable to the person upon trial, and acknowledges the preference that ten guilty should escape rather than that one innocent should suffer. The interest of the public that a particular crime should be punished is but as one to ten compared with the interest of the party that innocence should be spared. Acquittal only restores the party to the common rights of every other citizen; it restores him to no public trust; it invests him with no public confidence; it substitutes the sentence of mercy for the doom of justice; and to the eyes of impartial reason, in the great majority of cases, must be considered rather as a pardon than a justification.

But when a member of a legislative body lies under imputation of gravated offenses, and the determination upon his cause can operate only to remove him from a station of extensive powers and important trust, this disproportion between the interest of the public and the interest of the individual disappears; if any disproportion exists, it is of an opposite kind. It is not better that 10 traitors should be Members of this Senate than that 1 innocent man should suffer expulsion. In either case, no doubt, the evil would be great. But in the former it would strike at the vitals of the Nation; in the latter it might, though deeply to be lamented, only be the calamity of an individual.

* * * Yet in the midst of all this anxious providence of legislative virtue, it has not authorized the constituent body to recall in any case its representative. It has not subjected him to removal by impeachment; and when the darling of the people's choice has become their deadliest foe can it enter the imagination of a reasonable man that the sanctuary of their legislation must remain polluted with his presence until a court of common law, with its pace of snail, can ascertain whether his crime was committed on the right or on the left bank of a river; whether a puncture of difference can be found between the words of the charge and the words of the proof; whether the witnesses of his guilt should or should not be heard by his jury; and whether he was punishable because present at an overt act or intangible to public justice because he only contrived and prepared it? Is it conceivable that a traitor to that country which has loaded him with favors, guilty to the common understanding of all mankind, should be suffered to return unquestioned to that post of honor and confidence where in the zenith of his good fame he had been placed by the esteem of his countrymen, and, in defiance of their wishes, in mockery of their fears, surrounded by the public indignation, but inaccessible to its bolt, pursue the purposes of treason in the heart of the national councils? Must the assembled rulers of the land listen with calmness and indifference, secession after secession, to the voice of notorious infamy until the sluggard step of municipal justice can overtake his enormities? Must they tamely see the lives and fortunes of millions, the safety of present and future ages, depending upon his vote, recorded with theirs merely because the abused benignity of general maxims may have remitted to him the forfeiture of his life?

Such in very supposable cases would be the unavoidable consequences of a principle which should offer the crutches of judicial tribunals as an apology for crippling the congressional power of expulsion. Far different, in the opinion of your committee, is the spirit of our Constitution. They believe that the very purpose for which this power was given was to preserve the legislature from the first approaches of infection; that it was made discretionary because it could not exist under the procrastination of general rules; that its process must be summary because it would be rendered nugatory by delay.

I shall not take time to read the entire argument, but Senators will find it reported in Hall's American Law Journal, volume 1, beginning at about page 459. The argument of Mr. Adams and the position taken by the committee were that the right to expel did not in any way depend upon the violation of a law of the United States or of any State, but upon such misconduct as rendered it improper for the man to sit in the Senate. Of course, the misconduct referred to is that character of misconduct which affects the Government and not mere personal misbehavior.

Mr. President, I have no doubt hundreds of authorities can be accumulated to the same effect. I have quoted enough to make it seem plain to me that when the Senate comes to pass upon the admission of a Member it has the right and it is its duty to see to it that he comes into this tribunal with clean hands, as far as his election is concerned, and that while the certificate of election affords prima facie evidence of his right to here sit, when that certificate is challenged and when the evidence is brought forth to show that fraud or trickery or corruption entered into the obtaining of that certificate it is the duty of this body to protect itself against that fraud, that iniquity, and that corruption, just as much as it is the duty of a court of equity to set aside any instrument obtained by the same kind of improper methods, and that in all this we are not bound by the limitations fixed by the statutes of Wisconsin.

The Senator from Utah asked me a while ago why it was that I was taking time to argue this proposition. I am taking the time because the Senator from Idaho squarely plants himself upon the proposition that the statutes of Wisconsin were not applicable to this case. He does not expressly state that if they were expressly applicable to this case he would be obliged to reach another conclusion; but he states it in effect. I read from his report:

Were a candidate for a State office in Wisconsin to conduct a campaign in the manner in which the campaign of Mr. STEPHENSON and of other men who sought election to the United States Senate were conducted it would be very difficult to justify such conduct under the laws of the State.

Does that warrant a reply? Is it not his position squarely in this report that these acts which, he says, are subversive of the fundamentals of our Government are to be passed over, palliated, excused, and not considered because the statutes of the State do not apply to them?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, what the Senator from Missouri reads from the statement of the Senator from Idaho is not a reply to the question I propounded to the Senator from Missouri. My understanding of what the Senator says as to the statement of the Senator from Idaho, which he has now read, is that a Senator might be deprived of his seat if he had violated a statute of the State. What he was arguing a moment ago was that a Senator could be deprived of his seat even though he had not violated a law of the State; and the question I asked him was where he found a statement to the contrary of that—who had contended otherwise upon that proposition?

Mr. REED. I think the distinguished Senator who has just taken his seat has so expressly contended, and I desire now to submit my reasons to the Senate for that statement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me further, I expressly stated to the contrary in the Senate—that it was not necessary that a sitting Member should have violated any statute of the State, and that is self-evident. We are made by the Constitution the judges of the qualifications, the elections, and return of our own Members, and if we find that a Member has obtained his seat by bribery or corruption we can declare his seat vacant, whether or not there has been any violation of the law of the State. I never have contended otherwise, and the Senator can not find any language of mine to the contrary.

Mr. REED. I would not on any account misinterpret the position taken by the Senator from Utah. For his learning and his ability I have the profoundest respect. I am glad to have him say now that the position I have taken is correct and that the Senate is not bound and that its right to investigate is not circumscribed by the statute laws of the State of Wisconsin. I am glad to have it now admitted, so that there can be no doubt of the matter, that it is an immaterial thing whether the statutes of Wisconsin apply to these acts or not if in fact the acts were of such a nature as to violate public policy and good morals.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I resent the statement made by the Senator from Missouri that he is glad to have it now admitted, as if I had ever contended to the contrary.

Mr. REED. I would not willingly do anything to cause the resentment of the Senator from Utah, and I did not intend to offend him. On the contrary, I thought I was dealing very fairly with his statement. I will change my expression. I am glad to know that the position of the Senator from Utah now is and ever has been to that effect. But I may have read with some carelessness. Yet I find on page 25 of the report this language:

A careful examination of the bribery statutes of Wisconsin will indicate clearly that the expenditures of money of the character recited only come within the inhibitions thereof, when they are made corruptly, unless section 298 forbids it.

Then follows a quotation from section 298. Then, on page 26, there follows a legal argument, in which this appears:

None of these expenditures can come within any of the provisions of this section unless it be a violation of this language: "or who shall give or offer to give any valuable thing or bribe to any elector as a consideration for some act to be done in relation to such caucus or convention."

It should be stated that by sections 39 and 40 of the election laws of Wisconsin the criminal penalties applying to a caucus and elections are made applicable to primary elections.

If the words "to give any valuable thing" are to be given a comprehensive and literal interpretation, and to prohibit the giving or offering of "any valuable thing" "as a consideration for some act" to be done, it would not have been necessary to write into the statute the words "or bribe," because the former expression would include the latter. The purpose of the statute is evidently to prohibit corrupt giving.

"Words of a general import in the statute are limited by words of restricted import immediately following and relating to the same subject." (36 Cyc., 1119; Nance v. Southern R. R. Co., 149 N. C., 366.)

"In interpreting a statute, where the language is of doubtful meaning, the court will reject an interpretation which would make the statute harsh, oppressive, inequitable, or unduly restrictive of primary private rights."

So the argument is made that, technically construed, this statute does not apply. Turning now to the top of page 27, I find this:

At the time of this primary there was no statute, either State or national, limiting the amount of expenditures. There is no judicial or legislative decision, so far as we are advised, limiting the amount which may be legally expended. Can we, in the face of the fact that the Congress of the United States and the General Assembly of the State of Wisconsin prior to this election failed to limit election expenditures, now arbitrarily determine that because this sum was spent it was illegally and fraudulently expended, and therefore vacate the Senator's seat? Can it be said that the expenditure of such a sum is in contravention of a public policy which must be given the force and effect of a statute? If so, where does public policy draw the line between what shall be a legal and an illegal amount?

The situation is unfortunate, but the Congress and the State legislature are to blame for not having limited the expenses by statute. Laws can not be enforced retroactively, and surely this case must be decided in accordance with what the law then was and not in accordance with what the law ought to be. Since that election the State of Wisconsin has limited the amount of expenditure in a senatorial campaign to $7,500, and the Federal Government has limited it to $10,000.

Mr. President, the whole import of that argument from first to last is to construe this case out from under, if I may use such an expression, the statutes of the State of Wisconsin, and the whole argument is based upon the fact that there is no law, and hence there is no responsibility——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I fail to see, on looking at this matter as a lawyer, how the distinguished Senator can place such a construction upon the language used. In order to understand the views which were here submitted, we must first remember that the charge was made that these expenditures were a violation of the statutory law of Wisconsin. The burden of the argument which is submitted on behalf of those whose views have been quoted was to show that the acts complained of in the charges against the Senator did not come within the inhibition of the statute, and therefore the charge that was made to the effect that the statutory law had been violated must fall.

In the second instance, we are arguing the proposition that there was no limitation placed upon the amount of expenditures by the statute either of the State or any statute passed by Congress. We are not discussing the question as to what may be the effect of a violation of the principles of the common law, but we are expressly discussing the question as to whether or not there was a violation of the statutory law of the land.

It seems to me that my friend is laboring unnecessarily to establish the position that we have at any time contended that this seat might not be vacated if there was a violation of the principles of the common law on the subject of bribery or some similar subject. We never so contended.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, my esteem and friendship for the Senator from Ohio are so well known that every person here will acquit me, and the Senator himself will acquit me, of any intentional misconstruction of a report signed by him. I am glad to know that it appears to be settled by common and general consent that we are to weigh in the scales of justice which we hold, and that we are not to be controlled by the fact that the Legislature of Wisconsin may have failed to prohibit the acts now being investigated, but we are according to the very right and reason and justice of the matter to render our decision. That proposition, I take it, will no longer be disputed. But it still remains, Mr. President, to determine whether or not the Legislature of Wisconsin did have the right to pass a primary election law and whether it did have the right to prevent bribery and corruption at the primary election held under the laws of that State, and whether it did in fact pass laws inhibiting the acts now under investigation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just to conclude, because manifestly if a man shall have violated the laws of his State, that is a fact certainly to be considered when we are passing upon his right to a seat here obtained by such violation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him for just a moment again, I now have the reference to the record to which I called attention a moment ago and said that I had made my position clear upon the floor of the Senate on the question which the Senator was discussing. On March 4, at page 3021 of the RECORD, the Senator will find this statement:

> Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not contend that it would be necessary to show that the Senator from Wisconsin had violated any statute of the State of Wisconsin. If it were shown that he had by the use of money corrupted voters, bribed voters, I would not care whether there was a statute of the State of Wisconsin against it or not. I should vote in a case of that kind that the Senator forfeited his right to his seat.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator has put his remarks into the RECORD at this point. I did not have the pleasure of hearing them when they were uttered on the floor of the Senate. I say again it is with especial delight that I now understand we are all agreed upon this main proposition.

Mr. President, I maintain that the State of Wisconsin and every other State in the Union has the power and the right to pass primary election laws governing the method of the selection of members of the legislature, that the States have the right to pass laws which permit the people to express their choice for United States Senator, and that an interference by the use of money with expression of such choice can be denounced by the State as an act of bribery and punished as such.

I need not take time to call attention to the decision which has already been quoted in the report of the committee in 142 Wisconsin, in which the Wisconsin Supreme Court holds that the power does exist. The question I now desire to discuss is whether or not the statutes of Wisconsin with relation to bribery were in fact violated. I am compelled at this point to differ from the legal conclusion arrived at by the distinguished Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Utah in their report.

I call attention to a fact which I think the committee overlooked, or, if they did not overlook it, they do not give it the importance I attach to it. I hold it to be true that the legislature of a State has the right to absolutely prohibit the use of money in any election, primary or otherwise. It has the inherent power to say that not one dollar shall be expended; that the entire question shall be settled solely by such appeals to reason as can be made without the expenditure of money. That I am correct in that is shown by the fact that in State after State legislatures have passed laws limiting campaign expenses. The power to limit involves the power to prohibit. In my own State a Congressman is prohibited from expending a sum in excess of six or seven hundred dollars in his entire congressional campaign. Manifestly no election is a proper election which is anything more than an appeal to reason, so that a legislature undoubtedly has the power to say that no money whatever shall be expended. If a legislature has the power to prohibit vote buying, to say that it shall be bribery for a man to stand at the polls and buy the vote of another, for the same reason a legislature has the undoubted right to say that a candidate shall not buy the influence of another man over his fellows. If a legislature can say that I can not go to the ballot box and buy the vote of "A," simply one vote, then the legislature has the right and power to say that I can not take a thousand dollars and go to "B," who has an influence over 100 votes, and pay "B" to go out and influence or deliver those votes.

In construing any law we must of necessity take into consideration the evils it was intended to meet. We know that in many places there are what are known as political bosses, and when you have seen the political boss and have arranged with him it is not necessary to see the 100 or 200 or even 1,000 men who answer to his call and vote according to his dictate; therefore the legislature of the State did wisely, did sensibly, did properly when it made it a crime not alone to buy the vote at the box and pay for the delivery of the vote by the voter himself, but also prohibited the payment of money to another in order that that other shall influence the votes of third parties.

In other words, the Legislature of Wisconsin had the right to say, You can not corrupt a political boss, and having bought him thus obtain the 100 votes he controls, any more than you may by direct bribery secure 1 vote. In the first instance, you secure a hundred votes; in the second instance, a single vote; but in each instance you secure the votes by money. One act is as immoral as the other, but the purchase of the political boss is a hundred times more injurious than the purchase of the individual voter, because the money actually secures a hundred times as many votes.

Therefore, I say a legislature has the right to reach that sort of crime, and I affirm here that that is what the Legislature of the good State of Wisconsin did when it wrote the language I am about to call attention to. It provided in paragraph 1 of the act which you will find printed at page 11 of this report:

> 1. Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, give, lend, or agree to give, or lend, or offer, promise, or promise to procure or endeavor to procure any money or valuable consideration to or for any voter, to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any other person in order to induce any voter to vote or refrain from voting, or do any such act as aforesaid, corruptly, on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election—
> Shall be guilty of bribery.

Note the word "corruptly."

There is a requirement where you are buying the vote that you shall corruptly give the money to influence the vote.

Paragraph 2 follows, and it prohibits corruptly giving or offering any place or employment to induce any voter to vote or to refrain from voting.

Those two sections apply to the direct bribery of the voter, and the word "corruptly" appears; but when you come to section 3, it does not contain the word "corruptly." In order to get the word in that section you must resort to a strained construction. Paragraph 3 provides that—

> Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, make any such gift, loan, offer, promise, procurement, or agreement as aforesaid to or for any person in order to induce such person to procure or endeavor to procure the election of any person to a public office, or the vote of any voter at any election—
> Shall be guilty of bribery.

Paragraph 4 provides that—

Every person who shall, upon or in consequence of any such gift, loan, offer, promise, procurement, or agreement, procure, or engage, promise or endeavor to procure the election of any person to a public office or the vote of any voter at any election.

Shall be guilty of bribery.

And in neither of these cases is the word "corruptly" used at all.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. In view of the Senator's statement to the effect that the word "corruptly" does not appear in either the third or fourth paragraphs, and he is correct in that statement, I wish to call his attention especially to the fact that in each of the third and fourth paragraphs the words used are "such gift," referring evidently to the character of the gift which is described in paragraph 1 and paragraph 2, and that is a corrupt gift.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; "such gift" applies to the thing given. The word "corruptly" applies to the purpose for which it is given. Here are sections that refer to the payment of money, the making of gifts, and when the subsequent section says "such gift" it refers simply to the character of the thing given. But the word "corruptly" applies to the evil purpose, the criminal intent in the man's mind.

Now, why should there be a distinction made between the acts discussed in sections 1 and 2 and the acts discussed in sections 3 and 4? If I should give a man money at the time he is about to vote, and give it to him directly, it would be proper to say that I must have given it corruptly; that is to say, with the intention to influence that particular vote. The mere handing of the money to him would not be a thing that in itself would be a crime; I must have done it to get that particular vote. There is a reason why the word "corruptly" should appear there. But when you come to consider the question of employing me for a sum of money, large or small money, to go out and influence the votes of others, the word "corruptly" does not belong there, because I am selling my influence direct, my influence over the votes of others; and as I am selling my influence over the votes of others, a thing which in itself is corrupt, it is wholly unnecessary to require that it shall be proven that I corruptly did an act which in itself is corrupt. Whether a distinction exists or not is, however, perhaps immaterial because the lawmakers had the right to pronounce the doing of the act illegal, supplying the intent from the act itself. The word "corruptly" was, in fact, omitted, and it is not our business to supply it by any forced construction. Moreover the evidence shows enough corruption to sink a ship.

I shall not go outside of the testimony given here by the Senator himself and by his direct managers. I might as well discuss the evidence as a whole. This was a campaign which from its very inception to its close was violative of both the letter and the spirit of the statutes of Wisconsin. It was violative of good morals and common decency. The campaign was conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity.

Let us take a hasty survey of the situation. When the ordinary man is a candidate for public office the first thing he inquires of and concerning is public opinion. The first thing he tries to do is to appeal to the reason of the people. Any election which is conducted upon any other basis than an appeal to reason I denounce as utterly indefensible. Whenever coercion enters in, whenever fraud enters in, and whenever money becomes the appealing cause instead of reason, then it ceases to be an election within the proper meaning of the term.

Now, it may be said that money is used in all elections, and I grant that. It is used in all elections, but there are two uses to which money can be put in elections. One is to aid to pay the expenses of an appeal to the judgment, the conscience, and the patriotism of the citizen. Money which is put forth in that way is properly used. But when the appeal is not to the conscience, to the patriotism, to the love of country, to the justice and righteousness of a cause, when the appeal is not to the reason of the voter, but to his cupidity, then I say the line which separates corrupt methods from honest methods has been crossed and the field of infamy has been entered. Draw that line any other place—draw it, if you dare, any other place—and you will have placed it so far beyond the confines of that which is safe as to include those dangerous quicksands which, if not avoided, will drag the great structure of our Government to a grave of corruption and infamy.

Now, what was done in this case? Why, sirs, it was an astonishing thing. This man did not call together men to appeal to the public reason. This man did not get together those who could speak and talk for him or write for him. This man organized his campaign in the most peculiarly businesslike manner yet recorded in the history of the United States. He appointed a fiscal agent named Edmonds; he appointed a banker; and then he appointed a paper manufacturer to watch the banker. The first step in this campaign of reason and patriotism was the collection of a $50,000 note. The first contribution to the appeal to patriotism was the deposit of that $50,000 in this bank, subject to the orders of this fiscal agent. And how was it deposited? How would it have been deposited, first, by a man who had nothing to conceal? STEPHENSON had a checking account in that bank; he was a customer of that bank. The ordinary way to have deposited that money would have been to deposit it in his open account. The ordinary way to have paid out the money would have been on checks drawn, payable upon their face to certain individuals for certain causes and reasons, but this money was put in the bank and a certificate of deposit was issued.

If we were to stop at this point it might not seem so peculiar for a man to put money in a bank on certificates of deposit; but under the custom that exists in every bank I have ever dealt with, when you want to use the money that is held under a certificate of deposit you must bring in your certificate and surrender it, and if you draw only a part of the money you must have a new certificate made for the balance; but it appears that this money thus held under certificate of deposit was nevertheless used to check against. So when the fiscal agents desired a thousand or five thousand or ten thousand dollars they drew a check just as they would have done had the money been held on open account, and the check would be cashed just as though the money was held on open account. The certificate would then be reduced by that amount. Thus no bank entries were required; thus a secret account was maintained; thus no record was kept, although the statute——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just one moment—although the statute requires the strictest accountability from candidates of all moneys expended, to whom paid, and for what paid. They laid the plan to conduct their campaign without sending their checks through the bank in the ordinary way.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am sure the Senator from Missouri does not desire to misstate the testimony. My recollection is that Mr. STEPHENSON had no account in this bank, and I call the Senator's attention to page 133 of the record, where this occurred. It is only a question and an answer or two:

Senator POMERENE. What was the reason for not opening up an account with Senator STEPHENSON in your bank, as you would with any other customer of the bank?

Mr. PUELICHER. Senator STEPHENSON never requested it. We had these amounts from him for investment, at various times, and every time the investment was paid up we turned it into cashier's check, awaiting further orders, and would then have the instrument on hand to make the investment immediately.

Further on he says:

Mr. PUELICHER. I continued the account just as it had been run with Senator STEPHENSON before. He made no request——

Senator POMERENE. Did you ever do that with any other customer?

Mr. PUELICHER. We frequently carried funds in cashier's checks in that manner; yes.

Senator POMERENE. What was the purpose of doing that with Mr. STEPHENSON? I do not care about the others. What was the purpose of handling this fund in this particular way?

Mr. PUELICHER. Mr. STEPHENSON did not request that an account be opened, nor did he authorize an account opened, so I continued it just as it had been done before, thinking that an efficient way of handling it as far as I was concerned.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, my examination of this record leaves upon my mind the very distinct conclusion that Senator STEPHENSON did have a checking account in this bank, but that this particular fund was carried in this way. I have not time to stop at this hour to search for the record, but if I do find it I shall insert it to-morrow. If I do not find it, I shall cheerfully make the correction.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. LEA. I think the Senator from Missouri is incorrect in stating that the Senator from Wisconsin had an account with the bank; but that that was a very unusual proceeding, I think, is evidenced by this quotation from the testimony, on page 135:

Senator POMERENE. Have you conducted the business of any customer of the bank since this affair of Senator STEPHENSON in the same style or manner that you conducted Senator STEPHENSON'S transactions?

Mr. PUELICHER. No occasion of like nature has arisen since Senator STEPHENSON'S transaction.

Senator POMERENE. How long before that did any such occasion transpire?

Mr. PUBLICHER. Never, to my knowledge, have we conducted any campaign through the bank.

Senator POMERENE. Then it was out of the order, was it not?

Mr. PUBLICHER. It was the only one I know about and seemed to me good at the time.

Mr. REED. However that may be, no man will dispute that this $50,000 was held; that it was held for the purpose of beginning this campaign; that it was paid out in this way; and that these men from time to time called upon Senator STEPHENSON for more money.

Now, I call your attention to a most significant thing in this testimony. These men were appointed and told to conduct this campaign; they were placed in possession of these large sums of money. From time to time they tried to get Senator STEPHENSON to place a limit upon the amount they could expend, and here is the testimony of his manager, Mr. Edmonds:

Mr. EDMONDS. In my talk with Senator STEPHENSON I wanted to learn from him the amount of money he expected to expend. He seemed to think that too much money was being expended. I endeavored to have him fix an amount, so that we would not exceed it. This he declined to do, and I endeavored to show him the difficulty of conducting a campaign without knowing how much I might be allowed to expend; but I was not able to get him to state, and he said to go on and conduct the campaign—"use your best ability in conducting it," and left it in that way.

Here are three men engaged in spending money; the amount rises to a point that appalls them; they call in the man who employs them, and they say, "How far shall we go with this money? Where shall we stop?" His instruction is to "go and conduct the campaign the best you can." The implication is, spend all the money that is necessary in order to gain this battle; and they did proceed to expend the money in that way.

Moreover, I call your attention to testimony—I will not stop to get it and read it literally—that only twice during this campaign, after having established this fiscal agency for the distribution of money, did Senator STEPHENSON visit it. There was his headquarters; there was the place where public opinion was supposed to be molded. At a candidate's headquarters, if he is conducting a proper campaign, is where you will find him every few days, constantly keeping his finger upon the pulse of the situation; and yet here is a man who is expending, all told, $107,000, who has a headquarters, and who only visits the headquarters twice during the entire campaign. He gives no instructions where to expend the money or the purposes for which it is to be used. There is only the one broad, general instruction—"Go on with the campaign, conduct it to the end, and I will pay the expenses."

It is said he was in the city of Milwaukee only three times during the campaign and at this headquarters but twice; in other words, Senators, he turned the entire management of his campaign over to these three men and made them his absolute agents in the matter. He made these men his agents; evidence shows that express admission. He made these men his agents; they were his representatives; they were authorized to employ other agents and other representatives; and they drew upon his bank account for the money and called upon him to replenish it. If a man conducts a campaign in that way, I put it to you, must he not be held responsible for the acts of his agents? Why, I grant you, if a man is conducting an ordinary campaign and some man that he sent out to do something that was proper violated his instructions and did a thing that was corrupt, and the principal, upon discovery, repudiated the act, you would, of course, excuse the principal, provided he repudiated the benefits of the corrupt act at the same time he disclaimed the act itself. But if a man employs a general agent for the transaction of his business, if he creates a general agency for the conduct of his campaign, if he goes away and leaves everything in the management and control of that agency, then unless you hold him responsible for the acts of that agency you absolutely place him where there is no responsibility for the crimes of his agents and at the same moment permit him to reap the fruits of their iniquity. If you are to say in this case that Senator STEPHENSON is not to be held responsible for the things his three fiscal agents did, then you have opened the door for every kind of fraud. All that will be necessary hereafter will be for a man to furnish a large sum of money and select the right gentleman to expend it. They can spread the leprosy of corruption into every hamlet and village of the country; they can absolutely destroy all semblance of decency in elections; then he can stand off, with a holier-than-thou-art air, wash his hands, and say: "While it was done for me and in my behalf and while I claim the benefit of all that was done, and am here to-day because of what was done, enjoying the fruits of the enumerated villainy, yet I am not responsible for any evil. I closed my eyes; I shut my ears; I went away; I did not see it; it was done when my back was turned; and, therefore, I shall stand acquit."

Mr. President, if you ever write that down as a principle to be followed by other Senators in other days to come; if you put that down as a proper scheme and system of conducting an election, then you have written a rule under which every election in every State can be polluted by this miserable subterfuge of appointing an agent to do that which you dare not yourself do.

I come now to the question of whether there was, in fact, corruption by these agents. I remark, first, that when Senator STEPHENSON put the money into the hands of these men and authorized these men to use it for the purpose of getting other men to go out and influence the votes of third parties he violated that section of the statute of Wisconsin which I have just read, which expressly prohibits the payment of any money to any person in order to induce such person to procure or endeavor to procure the election of another person. That statute was intended to bar the purchase of influence; that law was intended to bar the buying of "the boss" who controls hundreds and even thousands of votes; that language was intended to prohibit and brand as criminal the very things done in this election.

We are told there is no evidence of actual corruption. Mr. President, the man who says there is not sufficient evidence of actual corruption in this case to satisfy the moral yearnings of the most particular is one who, in my humble judgment, is willing to shut his eyes to the plain facts of record, to draw around STEPHENSON the narrow circle of technical criminal law, to apply here the strict rule which would be applied in a criminal case were STEPHENSON on trial for his liberty. Such a rule has no business here. This is an investigation to determine the title to a seat in the Senate, not a prosecution to send a citizen to the penitentiary. It is true no man came forward and said, "ISAAC STEPHENSON paid me $100 for my vote." It is true no man came forward and said, "When I was paid $100 or $1,000"—or $5,000 by these fiscal agents—"I agreed to go out and corrupt the electorate of the State of Wisconsin." Nobody said that. If the Senate is to require that kind of evidence, then it will be impossible ever to prove sufficient corruption to affect a seat gained in this body through the bribery of the electorate. But what did happen? What does the record show? Let us look at it as sensible men, as men of experience, who do not close their eyes and who do not propose to take refuge behind the technical rules of the law applicable in criminal causes. It was said by John Quincy Adams, in the case which I cited awhile ago, that in examining questions of this kind the Senate is not held to the narrow rules of law and construction which obtain in criminal cases, where the rights of the citizen to life or to liberty are at stake.

Let us see what became of this money. One hundred and seven thousand dollars was expended. Only 56,909 votes were cast for this man. Was there an appeal to reason or was there an appeal to cupidity; was there an appeal to conscience and patriotism or was the appeal he made to the pocketbook? I put this conundrum to the Senate: If a man spends $107,000 and only gets 56,909 votes, how many votes would he have obtained if he had not spent any money at all? It will be an interesting question in mathematics and in morals for investigation.

This was not a race between men; it was a contest between bank accounts.

STEPHENSON spent $107,793.05 and received 56,909 votes, Cook spent $42,293.29 and received 47,825 votes, Hatton spent $26,413 and received 35,552 votes, and McGovern spent $11,063.88 and received 42,631 votes. Had STEPHENSON not corrupted the State, who doubts but that McGovern would have been here instead of STEPHENSON?

This was not a contest between different principles or ideas. It was a battle between dollars. It was a contest in which no man who did not expend large sums of money could hope to succeed. In view of the expenditure of $107,793.05 for STEPHENSON, and $42,293.29 by Cook, and $26,413 by Hatton, we are forced to say that this was not an election—it was rather a revelry of crime, a saturnalia of corruption. This was a case of selling the office to the highest bidder. The money was corruptly used—it could not have been otherwise employed. I say again a man must close his eyes very tightly if he can not see the corruption standing naked before him.

Let me follow just a few of the items of expenditure, and then I shall have concluded.

Twenty-five hundred dollars was paid to J. W. Stone, the game warden. For what purpose? The testimony is—and I quote the exact language:

For the purpose of getting his assistance in helping to nominate Senator STEPHENSON.

Q. What kind of assistance? Such kind as he could give in his best judgment.

I put it to you as practical men, as men who have observed the plain facts of life, who have not gone through the world asleep; I put it to you, when a man is called into the headquarters of a committee which consists of a banker, a fiscal agent, and a political manager, and that man is handed $2,500 without any specification as to how he is to use it, without any requirement of an accounting, without a word being said by way of limitation, the money simply being passed out to him "for the purpose of getting his assistance in helping nominate Senator STEPHENSON," what does that mean? In the realm of common sense how is it regarded? It is not doubted that the man who took that $2,500, sold himself for $2,500. This game warden undoubtedly intended to use a part of the money to spread the corruption a little beyond himself to make a little showing of delivering some goods, but the evidence shows that he kept a large part of it for himself. I must be either more charitable or more foolish than I am to-day when I believe this game warden did not in fact sell his political influence for cash in hand paid, and I must also be more charitable or more foolish than I am to-day when I believe the committee did not employ the money to coldly and deliberately buy the game warden and his influence over the men under him.

They paid $5,000 to a lawyer named Solon O. Perrin. Now, let us consider. Here is a financial committee; they are bankers; they know the value of money. Nobody in the world loves money as well as a successful banker. Dollars are the darlings of his heart; they are the idols of his soul; they are the soldiers with which he goes forth to conquer; they are the sentinels by which he guards his great business from attack; they are to him the guardian spirits to which he ever looks in his dealings with the world. He does not give out $5,000 to any man unless he expects to get something for it. I do not mean to say that bankers do not donate to charities; I do not mean that bankers do not do many good and splendid acts of that kind; but this was not a charitable undertaking; this campaign was not organized along the lines of eleemosynary undertakings; this was a cold, hard battle of dollars against other dollars, and the stake was the honor of Wisconsin and a seat in the United States Senate.

Five thousand dollars was paid to Perrin. He claims to have paid out $4,500 of this amount, and he paid it out in sums ranging from $10 to $300. Item after item appears in his account in which "cash" is charged with $50. This man was drawing the money out in cash. He was distributing it in cash. He could not tell, and he did not tell, where the money went, except a portion of it. He took this money—anyone can see it plainly as he reads this record—and went out, and wherever he could find a man who would take $10 or $50 or $100 and sell his influence and his vote he bought that man.

There was a man named Knell who distributed $12,103.21. I want to call your attention to that transaction just for a moment—a most interesting account is exhibited here by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. Of that $12,103.21 this remarkable thing is true, that $9,239.16 was paid out, not by checks but paid out in cash. I challenge attention to some other items of expenditure. The $12,103.21 that went into this man's hands he distributed, and mark the way it was distributed. He paid to a railroad conductor and to a locomotive engineer $450. Was that an appeal to reason or an appeal to cupidity? Was that an appeal to patriotism or an appeal to the pocketbook? Was that an appeal to honor and conscience or did it buy the two railroad men?

I find that an ironworker named Redfern was paid $145. Was that an appeal to his patriotism, or was that an appeal to the poor fellow's cupidity? I find that a man by the name of Phillip S. Farrelly, who was foreman somewhere, was paid $180. Was that an appeal to Farrelly's love of country, or was that an appeal to Farrelly's love of money?

I find that a machinist named Lee G. Melville was paid $200. Was that an appeal to Melville to vote for his country, his God, and his home, or was it an appeal to vote and work for $200 of dirty money?

So we can go through the long and sickening details of this evidence. The cold truth is that there is no sensible conclusion to be drawn from this record save this, that starting in a campaign Senator STEPHENSON recognized the fact that he could appeal to the reason of no man; that he was without political issue; that he stood as the champion of no great principle; that he did not represent opposition against any threatened wrong. And so he went into this contest with the only argument he had—money. It was to be a campaign in which "the barrel" was to be the central figure, in which "the barrel" was to be the fountain to which all who would might come and drink the slime of political corruption. Sir, it is put down in the record made by the Senator himself when he filed his account that outside the city of Milwaukee for services in organizing he paid to C. M. Hambright, John C. Miller, E. C. McMahon, E. J. Rogers, U. C. Kellar, and others evidently much too insignificant to name, $53,729.56, a sum of money which can not be earned and laid aside by the hard labor of 10 ordinary men in a lifetime.

And yet it was poured out in this short primary campaign to corrupt the State outside of Milwaukee. So we have had a contest of dollars. The statutes of the State have been trampled upon. In direct violation of law men were employed to go out and influence the votes of others. No limit was placed upon the amount of money to be used. The orders to the voters were, "Go to my banker." The orders to the banker were, "Come to me when you need more money. I will furnish you not arguments, not appeals to reason, nor yet solicitations for sympathy, but I will fill your pockets with that thing which has been potential among bad men since the world has been—I offer the coin of the realm."

I declare, without hesitation, the evidence in this case shows clearly, plainly, indubitably that these corrupt practices were indulged in to such an extent that the seat now held is a purchased seat. I appeal—whether it will reach deaf ears or responsive hearts I do not know—to the Senate of the United States again whether it can afford to say to the people of the United States, "Our committee found that the practices here exposed were subversive of the very Government itself; our committee found that the practices here laid bare were such that had they been indulged in by a man running for a State office in Wisconsin that man would have violated the law; our committee found that these iniquitous things have been done," and yet we permit the man responsible for these iniquities to retain his seat in the Senate and make laws for 90,000,000 honest folk.

I have no unkind personal feeling for the man STEPHENSON; I have no unkind personal feeling in my heart for him; not a particle; but, sir, the honor of this country and the honor of this body are in our charge. It is our duty to guard that honor. If we are to let this offense go acquit, then let us be brave enough to hang upon the door of the Senate the legend, "Those who have the price can enter here." Let us be brave enough to say, "Although you buy your seat, yet you shall hold it." Let us be courageous enough to face this issue exactly as it is.

The claim that we can not go back of the act of the legislature is an absurd one. Every step taken by a candidate, as he passes along the highway that leads to the office he seeks to fill, is a step that can be investigated and must be investigated if it is challenged.

I wish this case was not here. I wish, for the sake of the Senate, such cases never came here. I wish that men in this country would come to believe and understand that a seat in the United States Senate is not a matter of commerce and barter; that you can not buy it as you would a diamond necklace in a jeweler's window; that you can not purchase it as you would stocks and bonds and lands and timber and sawmills; that it is only to be gained by an honest appeal to the sovereign voters of this country. I say to you now the day is coming—the day is here—when every man responsible, directly or indirectly, for the pollution of the electorate of this country will have to account to an enlightened public conscience and to an aroused public vigilance.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 25, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Father soul, God of the living and of the dead, in the calm serenity of a perfect faith in Thee and the imperishable hope of the immortality of the soul, we stand with bowed heads and sorrowing hearts in Thy presence. Surely Thou hast laid a heavy hand upon us within the last week, the silver cord has been loosed, the golden bowl broken, and the spirits of two of our Members have taken their flight to the realms above. The well-remembered form, kindly face, and genial presence of him who had attained the distinguished honor of father of the House of Representatives has entered this historic Chamber and passed out for the last time—a patriotic citizen, a brave and gallant soldier, a wise councilor, a faithful servant of the people. Peace to his ashes, repose to his soul. How swiftly run the sands of life, how uncertain its tenure. Help us to close up the ranks and march forward to duty's call and be prepared to answer the summons, assured that Thy love encircles all. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, March 22, was read and approved.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE FOSTER OF VERMONT.

The SPEAKER announced as the committee to attend the funeral services of the late Hon. DAVID J. FOSTER, a Representative from the State of Vermont, Mr. SULZER, Mr. PLUMLEY, Mr. MCCALL, Mr. LLOYD, Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts, Mr. HIGGINS, Mr. FAIRCHILD, Mr. CLINE, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi, and Mr. LINTHICUM.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5624. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 20111) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PERKINS, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. OVERMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution (S. Res. 258):

Resolved, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate has elected FRANK B. BRANDEGEE, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, President of the Senate pro tempore, to hold and exercise the office in the absence of the Vice President on Monday and Tuesday, March 25 and 26, 1912.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions (S. Res. 259):

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. DAVID J. FOSTER, late a Representative from the State of Vermont.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn, and that in compliance with the foregoing the Vice President has appointed as said committee Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. PAGE, Mr. GALLINGER, Mr LODGE, Mr. RAYNER, Mr. BURTON, Mr. JONES, Mr. PERCY, and Mr. THORNTON.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 5624. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 19342. An act to amend section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to isolated tracts of public land; and

H. J. Res. 178. Joint resolution creating a commission to investigate and report on the advisability of the establishment of a permanent maneuvering grounds, camp of inspection, and rifle and artillery ranges for troops of the United States at or near the city of Anniston, county of Calhoun, State of Alabama, and to likewise report as to certain lands in and around the city of Anniston, county of Calhoun, State of Alabama, proposed to be donated for said purposes.

REPRINT OF BILLS.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of House bill 18958.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent for a reprint of House bill 18958. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman if he has ascertained from the document room that the print of this bill is exhausted?

Mr. NORRIS. I did ascertain that it was exhausted.

Mr. MANN. The clerks in the document room inform me that they have authority to order 1,000 copies of a bill reprinted at any time, without the necessity of getting an order from the House, and that the order from the House embarrasses them.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the gentleman that I can not inform him as to the details, but on Saturday I sent my secretary to get some copies of this bill, and was informed that there were no copies to be had in the document room, that they had all been exhausted.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that there is no reason why he can not get all the copies he wants. The other day the gentleman from Kansas asked for a reprint and it was allowed. After that I went to the document room and asked why there was any trouble about it, and they said there was no reason for getting an order from the House, that they would furnish all the copies desired of any bill.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all I want. I have tried to do that and have not been able to be supplied. There has been a great demand for this bill.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. What is the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. It is the bill that provides for the classification of all presidential postmasters.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he try it that way.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection, if I can get it.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman withdraw his request?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois and of other gentlemen about me, I will withdraw the request for the present.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of House bill 22143, the Philippine independence bill. The print has been exhausted.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I make the same suggestion to the gentleman that I have just made to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. GARRETT. Owing to the confusion on the floor I was unable to catch the gentleman's remark.

Mr. MANN. The document room on Friday informed me that it was an embarrassment to them to order a reprint through the House; that they have authority to print a thousand extra copies at any time when the print is exhausted. When that print is exhausted, they can order another thousand, and there is no trouble in getting all the copies that the gentleman desires.

Mr. GARRETT. If they will do that, then there is no necessity for having a reprint, but the question is upon what request the document room will act.

Mr. MANN. Upon the request of any Member.

Mr. FOSTER. If any Member makes a request for a reprint, the document room will comply with it.

Mr. GARRETT. I am making the request at the instance of the committee itself; but, Mr. Speaker, in view of the suggestions made by the gentleman from Illinois and others I will withdraw my request for the present.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, the following leaves of absence were granted—

To Mr. BELL of Georgia, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HEALD, for 4 days, on account of illness.

To Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota, for 10 days, on account of sickness in his family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. FULLER, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Clarence McBratney, Sixty-first Congress, third session (H. R. 28695), no adverse report having been made thereon.

The Senate met, after the expiration of the recess, at 1 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., Tuesday, March 26, 1912.

SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, directed by a resolution of the Senate to investigate certain charges against ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator from the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. ROOT obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Brown	Clapp	Curtis
Borah	Bryan	Crane	Fletcher
Bourne	Burnham	Crawford	Gamble
Brandegee	Burton	Cullom	Gardner
Bristow	Chamberlain	Cummins	Heyburn

Johnston, Ala.	Martine, N. J.	Root	Warren
Kenyon	Myers	Simmons	Watson

Mr. BURNHAM. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is necessarily absent from the city.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is out of the city on business of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE]. He is out of the city under the order of the Senate. I make this announcement for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have responded to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to present some proposed amendments to the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair the amendments are not in order at this time, under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask if anything is in order until the unanimous-consent agreement has been disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair nothing is in order except it be a point of order.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to inquire if it is not in order if a point of order is not made? In that case, would it not be in order to present the proposed amendments?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair it would not be in order, because it would violate the unanimous-consent agreement under which the Senate is acting.

Mr. WORKS. In order that the issue in this case, as I see it, may be more clearly and sharply defined, I now offer the following resolution as a substitute for the resolution offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from California submits his resolution and gives notice that he will offer it as a substitute at the proper time.

Mr. WORKS. I am offering it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One amendment in the nature of a substitute is already pending.

Mr. WORKS. I understood that the other amendment was presented to be offered subsequently. Am I mistaken with respect to that matter?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed, without having the record before him, that it was offered and notice given that it was the desire that it should be considered as pending.

Mr. WORKS. If the Chair is right about that, of course I concede that my resolution would have to lie on the table for the present. I desire, however, that the resolution may be read, because I think it is due Senators who are to discuss the question that the question I present should be known.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, the reading of the resolution is in order, because it is a matter connected with the motion pending. The Secretary will read the resolution which has been offered by the Senator from California.

The Secretary read Mr. WORKS's resolution, as follows:

Whereas an investigation of certain charges against Senator ISAAC STEPHENSON, affecting his right to a seat in this body, has been had by the Committee on Privileges and Elections; and

Whereas the charges under which said investigation was made go to the question of the corrupt use of money by said STEPHENSON; and

Whereas a majority of said committee has reported that the said charges have not been sustained by the evidence, but all of the members have condemned the said STEPHENSON for the expenditure of an excessive and unreasonable amount of money, characterizing his expenditure thereof as "in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of government"; and

Whereas it is an admitted fact that the said STEPHENSON put into the campaign to further his candidacy for United States Senator, and to secure his election thereto, placing the same in the hands of political managers for that purpose, the sum of $107,793.05: Now therefore Resolved, 1. That the furnishing of so large a sum of money to secure an election to the United States Senate is itself an act of corruption committed with the purpose of and with intent to secure such election.

2. That the said STEPHENSON was thereby guilty of corrupt practices affecting his election.

3. That ISAAC STEPHENSON was not duly or legally elected to a seat in the United States Senate by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. WORKS. As the Senator from New York is entitled to the floor, I shall not submit any remarks on the resolution at the present time.

Mr. HEYBURN. Before the Senator from New York takes the floor, it is proper to place the suggested amendment in proper relation to the discussion of this question. The Senator from California has, I may be pardoned for saying, omitted a part of the quotation which I am sure he intended to insert.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho suggests anything that I have omitted that should go into the resolution, I will be very glad to insert it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I refer to the quotation. I know the Senator did not intend to insert a part of the quotation, and I call his attention to it in order that it may be corrected, if the Senator thinks that I am right.

Mr. WORKS. If the Senator will give me a reference, I will be glad to look at it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would prefer to state it in open Senate for the RECORD.

Mr. WORKS. Very well.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not having the print before me, I speak from recollection. I think the Senator quoted the language that "such expenditures were in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of Government," and stopped there, as though that were all of the sentence.

Which contemplated—

The sentence proceeds—

which contemplated the selection of candidates by the electors and not the selection of the electors by the candidate.

The violation suggested refers only to that particular subject. It is not intended, nor does it say that these acts constituted a violation of the fundamental principles of the Government as a whole. I think the Senator would hardly like to divide that sentence.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, of course the quotation should be before the Senate fully, and then comes the question as to the construction to be placed upon it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I drew the sentence after several attempts to get the exact language that would express just what I meant to express. I dislike, of course, to see the sentence so stated as to convey a different meaning from that which I intended to convey.

Mr. WORKS. I had the exact language as it appears in the RECORD before me at the time, and there was certainly no intention to so state it as to result in a wrong construction of the whole sentence.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not intend, and the language will bear me out in the contention, to say that it violated all the principles of Government; but I enumerated the only principle that it was intended to apply to.

Mr. WORKS. Whether the Senator from Idaho intended to say that or not, that is my construction of the acts; and I certainly do not want to misquote him.

Mr. HEYBURN. And of course it is perfectly proper for the Senator to state his judgment as to whether any act was a violation of any principle of government. However, I did not want it quoted from my report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the consent of the Senate, the Chair desires to state, in connection with the ruling of the Chair upon the resolution offered by the Senator from California, that the substitute resolution proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is annotated on the back as follows, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

MARCH 22, 1912. Resolution offered by Mr. JONES as an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, for the motion made by Mr. HEYBURN on February 19, 1912, as follows:

"Mr. HEYBURN. I move that the report of the committee be adopted and that ISAAC STEPHENSON be declared entitled to a seat as Senator from the State of Wisconsin in the United States Senate."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the RECORD of March 22, Friday, discloses the following in relation to that matter, which the Secretary has here on the file. The Secretary will read it for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], that the Senate agree to the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in reference to the charges preferred by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin against ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator from that State, I submit and desire to have pending the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That ISAAC STEPHENSON was not duly and legally elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin."

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho rise to a question of order? The Senator from New York has been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. HEYBURN. I rise to a question that is always in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to say, and I would ask leave to say it in the Senator's time if he were on his feet addressing the Senate, what a Senator, as it is stated here, in charge of a measure, may say, that the resolution which I offered on the floor was in exact conformity with the resolution that has brought the issue to the attention of the Senate in all other matters of this nature. It was not a departure from the rule.

Mr. ROOT. I ask that the resolution which is now before the Senate be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the pending resolution.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 223, by Mr. JONES——

Mr. ROOT. I ask that the resolution offered in support of the report of the committee be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending resolution is the resolution of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] in the nature of a substitute for that of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. ROOT. I ask that the resolution for which that is a substitute be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. HEYBURN. I move that the report of the committee be adopted and that ISAAC STEPHENSON be declared entitled to a seat as Senator from the State of Wisconsin in the United States Senate.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I can find neither in the testimony nor in the reports and views of members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections nor in the arguments which have been made in the Senate upon these resolutions any justification for refusing to agree to the conclusion reached by the committee.

There are two provisions of the Constitution under which the conduct of a Senator may be called in question and made the subject of judgment by his colleagues in the Senate. The first is contained in section 5 of Article I, which provides that—

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

And the other is the second paragraph of the same section of the same article, which provides that—

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member.

On the 15th of August last the Senate adopted a resolution directing the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections to inquire—whether in the election of said Isaac Stephenson as a Senator of the United States from the said State of Wisconsin there were used or employed corrupt methods or practices.

Upon that resolution the committee has reported as follows:

Wherefore your committee, having given full consideration to the law and to the testimony and to all of the facts and circumstances brought to its notice, does find that the charges preferred against ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, are not sustained, and your committee further finds that the election of said ISAAC STEPHENSON as a Senator of the United States was not procured by corrupt methods or practices.

It is plain, Mr. President, that questions for judgment of the Senate under these two different provisions of the Constitution are widely different questions. Much of the testimony which has been adduced and most of the argument upon that testimony which I have heard and have read are addressed properly to the question that we would have before us if proceedings had been taken under the second provision authorizing the Senate with the concurrence of two-thirds to expel a Member. We are not proceeding under that provision. The question that we have before us is a question as to the election, return, and qualification of Mr. STEPHENSON, not a question as to whether he has been guilty of conduct which would justify the Senate in expelling him from its membership.

No question is raised regarding the return of Mr. STEPHENSON'S election upon the face of the certificate which came to the Senate in the ordinary course of law. He was regularly elected a Senator. There is no question as to his qualification. He possesses without challenge the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution, and no Senator has asserted, or will assert, that it is competent for us to add to or detract from the sum of the qualifications which the Constitution prescribes for a Senator.

The sole question is as to the election of Mr. STEPHENSON, and upon that the question is whether the votes that appear by the returns to have been cast for him are valid votes. If they are valid votes, he is entitled to his seat no matter what his conduct may have been. If they are invalid votes, then there is no lawful election.

The testimony shows that on the 26th of January, 1909, in accordance with the statute, the two houses of the legislature of Wisconsin met separately and voted for a Senator of the United States. It shows that in each house a majority of the votes cast were cast for Mr. STEPHENSON. Thereafter, in accordance with the statute, the Legislature of Wisconsin met in joint assembly, and it was plainly the duty of the presiding officer of that joint assembly to declare the result, which was that a majority of the votes having been cast in each house for Mr. STEPHENSON, he was elected Senator. That course, however, was not followed; but the joint assembly proceeded again to ballot, and, after a long series of days passed in balloting, finally there came a ballot in which a majority of the votes cast were cast for Mr. STEPHENSON, and he thereupon was declared elected. If those were valid votes, Mr. STEPHENSON is entitled to his seat; and not only is he entitled to his seat, but the citizens of the State of Wisconsin are entitled to have him take and keep his seat, and every citizen of the State of Wisconsin is entitled to have him take and keep his seat. More than that, the people of every State of the Union are entitled to have, and every citizen of New York or of Michigan or of Georgia or of California is entitled to have, him take and keep his seat. That right of the people of our country can not be brushed aside by the production of evidence which may lead Members of the Senate to feel that it was wrong that Mr. STEPHENSON should have been elected; by the production of evidence upon which argument may be based that his conduct has been such that he ought not to sit in this body It is not for us to determine whether the conduct of any man should lead to his being included or excluded as a Representative in Congress of a State in this Union. So long as he is sent here by valid votes, the Constitution provides that—

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof.

If any man comes here chosen by the legislature of his State, it is not within our power to say that he shall not occupy his seat, unless he is guilty of conduct which, charged against him, leads to an expulsion by a vote of two-thirds of the Senate.

I dwell in limine upon this distinction, because I think there has been a failure to observe it in a large part of the argument which has been made against the report of the committee. The evidence discloses the fact that a very large amount of money was used in this primary campaign in the State of Wisconsin. $107,000, in behalf of Mr. STEPHENSON, forty-two thousand and odd dollars in behalf of another candidate, and large sums in behalf of others.

Mr. President, the evidence discloses the prevalence in the State of Wisconsin during the primary campaign that ultimately resulted in Mr. STEPHENSON's election to the Senate of a bad old practice, which I believe to be passing away, and happily passing away—the bad old practice of electioneering by appeals to personal favor, to personal kindliness, to good fellowship, to the feeling created by personal social intercourse, and which by the use of money for the employment of advocates tends to substitute appeals of that description for appeals to the sober judgment of the electorate. I look with the greatest satisfaction upon the statutes which are aimed to control and to dissipate the habit into which our people have fallen, of electioneering in that way; but, sir, the fact that in the development of our national ideas as to the proper conduct of government, we are passing out from under the control of an old practice that should be laid aside, does not justify us in imposing upon a judgment as to the validity of an election our opinion as to the proper way of seeking for the favor of the people who take part in the election.

Nine-tenths of everything that has been said here regarding the use of Mr. STEPHENSON's money in this election is wholly irrelevant to any question as to whether or not this election is valid. In passing let me observe that a mere statement of the sum of money which is said to have been expended may lead to doing injustice to Mr. STEPHENSON, because, it seems to me as I examine this evidence, that probably a very large part of it was not expended. I should not think it an accurate statement to say that Mr. STEPHENSON expended $107,000. I would rather say he gave up $107,000, and no one knows how much of it was expended. Certain portions of it have been accounted for, accounted for by statements of expenditures, some of which were in very bad taste and some of which were entirely proper.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from New York says that a very large portion of this money was not expended. Every dollar of this money, Mr. President, went into the hands of the electorate. The man to whom it was paid might not have paid it to anyone else, but he himself was a voter and the influence of the money operated upon him as a part of the electorate whether he paid it to the other individuals or not. All this money went into the electorate and controlled and influenced the election.

Mr. ROOT. Well, Mr. President, the money that went into the hands of the persons whose agency is charged against Mr. STEPHENSON can not well be treated as money which was expended by those agents for the purpose of influencing the election.

With this preface, let us turn to the question whether the 123 votes which were cast for Mr. STEPHENSON in the joint assembly or the majority of votes which were cast for him in the separate houses were valid votes. There is practically no claim made that the men who cast those votes did not cast them honestly. The votes were not procured by the bribery of the men who cast them. I say there is practically no evidence and practically no claim that any 1 of the 123 men who voted for Mr. STEPHENSON was paid to vote for Mr. STEPHENSON; there is no evidence or claim that they were coerced to vote for him; there is no evidence or claim that they were misled by deception to vote for him; and the case is entirely wanting in all the circumstances which have formed the basis of contested elections in this body hitherto, in that the entire body of votes cast by duly elected members of the Legislature of Wisconsin for this candidate were cast by honest men, free to discharge their duty, and discharging it with full knowledge of the facts.

Sir, it is going a good way to say that under a provision of the Constitution which declares that a Senator shall be elected by the legislature of the State, when the Senator comes here with a duly authenticated certificate that votes of a majority of the legislature of his State have been duly cast for him, and no one questions the honesty or the freedom or the full knowledge of the members of the legislature who cast them for him, we can deny him a place in this body.

I say it is going a long way to say that, but still I believe there may be circumstances under which it can be done. I agree with the proposition which was presented in the Payne case, that if members of the legislature vote pursuant to the determination of a party caucus, and it can be shown that the determination of the party caucus was obtained by bribery, that indirect effect upon the casting of a legislator's vote may communicate the bribery to the final vote. I agree with the proposition which was made in the Caldwell case, that the purchase of the withdrawal of an opponent who controls certain votes and at the same time his turning over of his votes to another candidate might be held to vitiate the vote so obtained by the indirect use of money, but that is not the case here. The members of the legislature voted for Mr. STEPHENSON, so far as there is in this record any evidence at all of the influences which were brought to bear upon them or which actuated them in their vote, because Mr. STEPHENSON was the regular candidate of the Republican Party.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. KERN. May I inquire how he became the candidate of the Republican Party?

Mr. ROOT. I was about to state that. The law of Wisconsin provides, chapter 451, Laws of 1903, as follows—and I read from the quotation contained in the report of the committee:

> Party candidates for the office of United States Senator shall be nominated as other State officers. (Subdivision 3 of sec. 2.) Nomination papers for candidates for the office of United States Senator shall be filed in the office of the secretary of state. (Subdivision 1 of sec. 6.) The person receiving the greatest number of votes at the primary as the candidate of the party for the office voted for shall be the candidate of that party for such office.

Under that law the voters of Wisconsin proceeded at the election for members of the legislature in the year 1908 to vote at the primary for candidates of their respective parties for the office of United States Senator.

Mr. STEPHENSON, as a Republican candidate, received 56,909 votes; Mr. Cook, a Republican candidate, received 47,825 votes; Mr. McGovern, a Republican candidate, received 42,631 votes, and others received a smaller number of votes. The vote cast for Mr. STEPHENSON exceeded the vote for the next highest candidate by the number of 9,084. He had 9,084 plurality. Now, if we pass from the consideration of the——

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. WORKS. Before the Senator leaves that question, I should like to ask him a question. Suppose the Senator be correct in his statement that the members of the legislature honestly voted for Mr. STEPHENSON, and suppose further that they honestly believed that they should vote for him because he was the candidate of the party as a result of the votes at the primary election, and suppose that he succeeded in becoming the candidate by the vote at the primary election by the corrupt use of money, would not that affect his election?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from California confirms me in the hope I have entertained that the plan which I had formed for my remarks on this subject was suited to meet the real questions in the case, for his question would do very well as series of headings or table of contents of what I am about to say.

I say, suppose that we pass the consideration of the honesty and the freedom of the votes cast by the members of the Legislature of Wisconsin in the primary election, and consider the validity of the votes cast in that election, a proceeding entirely outside of the provisions of the Constitution and entirely outside of the provisions of the Federal statute, nevertheless a proceeding which did affect, and to a great extent determined the action, and which furnished the motive for the action of the members of the legislature in casting their votes, how are we to determine whether the primary election was valid or invalid, for that is the question which we reach by this process?

The members of the legislature voted for Mr. STEPHENSON because they regarded him as the candidate of their party. Was he or was he not the candidate of their party? That is the question. According to the law of Wisconsin, the Republican who received the highest number of votes at that primary was declared to be the candidate of the Republican Party. According to the returns Mr. STEPHENSON received 9,000 more votes than any other Republican, and if those were valid votes, then, under the law of Wisconsin, he was the candidate of the Republican Party.

What is there to impeach the validity of that election? Does anyone undertake to show that those 9,000 votes or any considerable proportion of those votes were invalid? No. What we are told is that a large amount of money was distributed in the State of Wisconsin to people who went about soliciting favors for Mr. STEPHENSON, talking about him, telling the people what a great and good man he was, talking in saloons and treating to cigars and drinks, besides the hiring of carriages, automobiles, and workers to get the people to come out and vote; but, sir, what is there to impeach these votes? I call the attention of the Senate to the clear and indisputable proposition that you have got to impeach the votes. The way in which the vote is obtained is of no consequence, unless the vote is corrupted, unless the vote is invalidated. I say it is of no consequence—it is of no consequence upon our consideration and judgment under the clause of the Constitution under which we judge of the election of our Members; but it might be of great consequence if there were a motion to expel a Member.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Do I understand the senior Senator from New York to declare that, if the members of the legislature have innocently and honestly voted, the election of a Senator can not be impeached, however corrupt some of the preceding steps may have been? I understood the Senator to say a moment ago that, as was held in this body some years ago in a case where a caucus was under corrupt influence, the action of the legislature will not be recognized if it yields to that influence.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I must ask my colleague not to insist upon my repeating what I have already stated.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If that be so, would not the corrupting influence at the initial stage of such a matter, namely, at a primary, equally impeach the electors?

Mr. ROOT. The expression "corrupting influence" may mean influences which would invalidate a vote or it may mean influences that would not. The question is whether there are corrupting influences brought to bear upon a vote so as to invalidate it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator one other question. In principle, does he discover a difference between the corrupting influence that may govern a caucus and the corrupting influence and the improper use of money at a primary?

Mr. ROOT. I do not.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is all.

Mr. CUMMINS. The opinion the Senator from New York has reached and announced is, if I understand it, that those who seek to impeach the title to the seat under consideration must show that the 9,000 votes or more, which measured Senator STEPHENSON'S plurality, must be shown to have been corrupted, so that that number, being deducted from those which apparently were cast for him, will leave him not with a plurality, but with fewer than a plurality; in other words, to apply the same doctrine to the primary vote that has heretofore been applied when members of the legislature have been shown to have been corrupt. Do I understand correctly the position of the Senator from New York?

Mr. ROOT. The Senator from Iowa does correctly understand my position with one modification, and that is I do not think it is necessary to prove in 9,000 separate cases that a vote has been corrupted. It must be the law, by which we must be governed, that it is necessary to prove that the vote has been corrupted. You can not take away the right of a citizen of Wisconsin to cast his vote and to have it counted and to have it effective by anything that other persons may do with each other.

Now, sir, I am not in favor of hiring people to go to the friends of a candidate or to curry favor by all the old means of electioneering, but I deny that because A and B make an arrangement in which B is induced by money, induced by hope of a reward, induced by personal favor, to undertake to influence C, a voter, that inducement to B invalidates C's vote. I deny that anything that A and B do can invalidate C's vote. You have to bring it home to C. I say, sir, there is nothing in this testimony in the way of substantial evidence to justify us in depriving the 9,000 men who cast votes of having them counted in accordance with the law of Wisconsin.

How can you, sir, say that a voter of Wisconsin was affected by whatever argument or appeal was presented to him by the man who had Mr. STEPHENSON'S money in his hand? It is a monstrous proposition—that an elector, voting for a candidate, can have his vote taken away by something that two other men do between each other.

Mr. OVERMAN. In the Caldwell case, Caldwell being A made an arrangement with Carney, who was B——

Mr. ROOT. By which Carney turned over the votes which he controlled.

Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator entirely correct when he says Mr. Carney turned over his votes? Does not the record simply disclose that Mr. Caldwell paid him $15,000 to step out and leave him the sole candidate?

Mr. ROOT. The necessary corollary is that he turned over his votes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg the Senator's pardon, but I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. ROOT. I am very glad to have an interruption for any suggestion.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator will recognize, I believe, that while, if the corruption is practiced by a third person without the knowledge of the person holding the seat, enough members of the legislature must be corrupted to change the result, yet if the person whose seat is challenged has guilty knowledge of the corruption of a single vote, even though it be not decisive of the result, nevertheless the title to the seat may be successfully challenged. Does the Senator recognize that the same rule would apply with regard to a primary voter casting his vote in a primary election?

Mr. ROOT. I am not able to say, Mr. President, what extension of that rule is practicable or possible to the new form of election which we call primary election. I do not think it is a practical question here, because there is here no evidence of the corruption of primary voters on the part of Mr. STEPHENSON; no evidence upon which you can impute to him the corruption of any voter. He employed agents to secure the favor of the electors, and the securing of that favor is certainly not corruption. No evidence is produced here of any man who voted at a primary in pursuance of an agreement to vote for compensation or for a bribe—none that I have seen and none that I have heard produced. The weight and burden of the argument here is that the hiring of these men and the paying of newspapers to publish favorable articles is the corrupt use of money. I say, whatever you may call it, it does not go to the question that is before this Senate now. It is nothing but a question of the conduct as between Mr. STEPHENSON, or Mr. STEPHENSON'S agents, and the people whom he employed to do the work for him.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York further yield?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not intend to call the attention of the Senate or the Senator to the testimony, but I think this question may clear the atmosphere a little. Suppose Senator STEPHENSON had given the $107,000 to Mr. Edmonds—was it?—with the direction that he expend it upon the members of the legislature for the purpose of securing his election, being careful to limit it to legitimate expenditures, and that is all the knowledge Senator STEPHENSON had of the manner in which the expenditures were made. Suppose Mr. Edmonds had then bribed one member of the general assembly, not enough, of course, to change the result; would or would not Senator STEPHENSON be within the rule I have suggested of having guilty knowledge or being in a guilty way a participant in the outcome?

Mr. ROOT. I dislike very much to answer moot questions, because other cases are liable to arise, and I would rather consider a case upon its own facts than to express opinions upon entirely supposititious cases.

I will say to the Senator, however, that I do not think in the case he puts the results which come from the corruption of a smaller number than is necessary to affect the result could be imputed to Senator STEPHENSON. I think he appointed his managers, and he paid out money, the evidence shows a great deal more than he meant to pay out or wanted to pay out, as they made demands upon him, but he personally took practically no part in the campaign. So I say there is not in this case any bringing home to him of the corruption of any member of the legislature or the corruption of any elector at the primary which would justify in any way our refusing to give legal effect to the votes that were cast, which would justify us in depriving the men who cast the votes of the right to have the votes counted and made effective. And I say that, under the circumstances of this case, the vote of the legislature can not be rejected upon showing that they voted because of the majority in the primary which Mr. STEPHENSON had without showing that the number of votes which made up that majority were corrupted or by any reason invalid.

Surely, while we have a broad discretion in our treatment of the election of our Members, when we consider the question whether the members of the legislature were misled in regard to who was the candidate of their party and for the purpose of determining that we go to the primary election and determine whether or not STEPHENSON was the candidate of his party, we should apply the ordinary and established rules applied to elections by the great tribunals of the country. I think you will not find in any court, National or State, any case in which a rule of computation has been applied which would justify the wiping out of the 9,000 votes plurality and put Mr. STEPHENSON in the place of not having been in fact the legally selected candidate of his party.

It follows that the members of the Legislature of Wisconsin who cast the votes which have been returned here voted not merely freely, not merely without corruption, but they voted in reliance upon what was the fact, that Mr. STEPHENSON was the legally selected candidate of his party.

Mr. President, we have very broad powers. We have wide discretion, but it is not an arbitrary discretion. Our power to judge of the election of our Members does not justify us in going according to whim or opinion upon questions of policy, nor indeed if there were a motion made to expel Mr. STEPHENSON under the other clause of the Constitution would we be at liberty to act upon any such rule.

We are told here that Mr. STEPHENSON by hiring men to go out and work for him and by paying newspapers to publish favorable articles has violated the fundamental principles of our Government. Well, Mr. President, I do not feel so sure of that. I think it is very bad practice for a man to hire people to go out and vaunt his virtues among the electorate, but I am not sure that it is so much worse than it is for a man to go out and vaunt his own virtues before the electorate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I seem to have been particularly unfortunate in phrasing——

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, may I say I did not refer to what the Senator from Idaho has said? I referred to the arguments that have been made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. HEYBURN. I think in fairness to the report of the committee and the chairman of the committee that phrase should be stated perhaps with more than usual care, because there is just one principle referred to, and it is stated.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I realize that the majority carefully guarded the statement. Gentlemen arguing on the floor of the Senate have not guarded their statements, and I have heard repeated over and over again here the proposition that Mr. STEPHENSON should be denied his seat in the Senate because he has violated the fundamental principles of our Government.

I say I do not feel so sure that it is worse, that it is more injurious to the interest of the people of the country for a man to employ men to go and vaunt his virtues and merits than it is for a man to do it himself. We employ lawyers to present with all the arts of argument and of persuasion our claims before juries and courts. We employ agents to market our goods and laud them to the skies. I do not know that it does violate the fundamental principles of our Government for a man who has grown old in an honorable life in his community, whose voice can no longer be heard upon the hustings, who has not the physique or the acquired habit of the lawyer or the political speaker to enable him to go out and laud himself to the people of his State, to employ men to do it.

I do not approve it, sir, but I confess that it is far more distasteful to me to see candidates going about and lauding themselves. But if he did, if this was a violation of the fundamental principles of our Government, if it were such a violation of fundamental principles that we could expel a man for it, are we to deprive the voters of Wisconsin of their right to have a representative in the Senate who has been elected by the honest votes of the legislature of their State in accordance with the Constitution, because the man whom they have selected has violated fundamental principles of our Government?

Mr. President, I take leave to hold the opinion that there are Senators in this Chamber who have violated the fundamental principles of our Government in their departure from the system of representative government, in their denial of our right to trust the people of our country to select wise and faithful representatives, in their denial that there are men in their community of honor and probity who can be trusted to represent the people of the community. I think there are Senators here who have violated the fundamental principles of our Government by their proposal to destroy the independence of the judiciary of our country, which alone avails to preserve the great fundamental barriers of the liberty of the citizen against the unrestrained power of a tyrannical government. But, sir, I do not conceive that, because I think these, my colleagues, are so misled as to violate these fundamental principles of government, I am at liberty to say that the people of their States can not send them here to represent them.

Mr. President, it is but a few months since I stood upon the floor of the Senate arguing against the retention of a sitting Senator in his seat because I believed that the evidence showed the votes of the members of the legislature who elected him to have been purchased. I warn the Senate now that the exercise of the right to do speedy and stern justice where there has been corruption does not give warrant to introduce as an additional qualification of the right to a seat in this body any requirement of conformity to our views as to what are the fundamental principles of our Government. There could be no more fatal blow to the just administration of that law which we are charged with administering, to keep pure the membership of this great body, than the introduction of a principle which leaves us with no rule of justice to apply and makes every seat depend upon the opinion of the Members of the Senate as to the policy which men ought to advocate.

We have lived for more than a century and we have inherited the jurisprudence of many centuries during which the elections and qualifications of members of legislative bodies have been determined by those bodies, but never, sir, in all the legislative history of England and America can you find a case in which the exercise of the power vested in a legislative body to deny a seat to a member has been carried to such an extreme of fantastical whimsicality as is proposed in the resolution to unseat Mr. STEPHENSON.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, these are the most unpleasant matters with which we have to deal in the Senate. I am sure that everyone would be glad to be relieved from dealing with such matters if it were practicable to do so. But the proposition is here for determination, and each must bear his part as he sees it in the light of the facts and the record.

I think, Mr. President, it is just to the committee to say a word in regard to the manner in which the committee discharged its duty and in regard to the report which it has brought into the Senate. Certainly whatever difference of opinion there may be among us with reference to what the report shows or the hearings disclose, we must agree that the committee did its work in an efficient and thoroughgoing fashion. We have before us perhaps as accurate and complete a gathering of the evidence as could be had, and we have it before us in such a way that every Member of the Senate may be, with as little labor as could be expected in so important a matter, advised as to what the record contains.

I desire also to say that, so far as the law is concerned, I do not think I differ in any respect from the views expressed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I hold a different view, however, with reference to what the evidence or the facts disclose as to the effect which this large expenditure of money has had upon the general electorate, which, as a moral proposition, finally controlled the legislature which selected the Senator for this body.

I am not able to look at this case in the narrow light in which it has been viewed by some. It has a wide significance and is an instructive commentary upon what is fast becoming a national vice. I think our national pride does not permit us to believe that the things which have affected other people injuriously must affect us in the same way if they are not controlled. No one ever admits, of course, that the vices which undermine the character of others will ever get such hold upon him that it will in any wise injure or affect his character. Nations are but aggregations of individuals in this respect. We are not willing to admit that the corrupt influences which have had such a direful effect upon other nationalities will, if not resisted, have the same effect upon our Nation; and we are not willing to admit that the same course is being pursued by those influences precisely as were pursued in the history of other countries.

I call attention to this, Mr. President, for the reason that as a society grows older and more schooled in the methods which may be pursued to accomplish illegitimate purposes, different schemes and different policies and different plans will be adopted, and we can not content ourselves with a rule for the discovery of corruption and for the resisting of the influence of corruption which might have obtained and been efficient in this country a hundred years ago. We must meet this insidious, subtle influence in its different forms and in whatever manner it may arise in the different stages of society. Through a multitude of ways it will seek to accomplish its purpose, and it devolves on us to be equally vigilant and equally versatile as to methods in resisting it.

I have been interested in looking back over the history of Rome as it is outlined in the fascinating and instructive book known as Ferrero's Rome. After Rome had won supreme power in the Mediterranean and had become the greatest political factor in the world, Ferrero calls attention to some things which led to Rome's destruction, and which, if they were cut out and recopied into the current history of to-day, would not be distinguished from the facts as they actually are. He says:

> It is true that corruption was not entirely open and shameless. From time to time Rome would still profess horror at the revelation of a scandal, such as the affair of the Prætor Hostillus Tubulus, who was convicted of having sold his verdict in a murder trial. But how was it possible to keep watch and ward over the subterranean channels of intrigue and corruption? Who could call rich magnates to account for insidious entertainments that broke down the last scruples of a needy and gluttonous nobility? Who could gauge the exact influence of money on dependents in an election or proclaim the opportune and unacknowledged distribution of parties?

I read another paragraph from Ferrero:

> The Roman electorate numbered at this time some 910,000 voters. * * * Skillful wirepullers had thus gradually been enabled to elevate dealing in votes to the level of a regular trade. They formed the dregs of the electorate into organized clubs or colleges and made sure of their men by a careful system of free dinners and petty largess. Then they sold their votes by contract to the several candidates with complicated precautions to insure the faithful execution of the promises.

How was it possible to measure, to gauge, to circumscribe the insidious influence of money upon the electorate, and how was it possible to measure the effect of unacknowledged distributions of political parties? According to the argument of the distinguished Senator who has just taken his seat [Mr. ROOT] that would seem to be the precise difficulty with which we here have to contend. And yet we are called upon to deal with it as we would be expected to deal with a frank and open foe. We know that a vast amount of money was put into the election, a fortune was distributed among the electorate, and because we are unable to select out the individual voter and put our brand upon him as the purchased voter it is said that our inquiry there must end.

But if we are to deal with the insidious influence of corruption we must have not only a more practical but we must have a more common-sense conception of the method in which we are to deal with it. If we find this influence set to work in a prodigious manner upon the electorate, we must call upon the men who set the influence to work to show that it did not in fact have the effect of corrupting the electorate. I am not willing to subscribe to the rule that after we have clearly shown the plan and purpose to control an election by money that we must then individualize every voter whom it affected.

If a candidate for the Senate sees fit to turn loose in a single election an amount of money which would have startled Catiline himself, I hold that from the time that that corrupting influence is turned loose upon the electorate the duty devolves not upon this Senate, but upon the man who set the corrupting influence to work and who claims his seat in the Senate to show that it was used in a way not to influence the electing body. I think it is a sound principle of morals and a sound principle of law, if a wrong mingles with a right—and I am unable to separate the wrong from the right—then the wrong and the right constitute a wrong, and the man must be held responsible for it who put the wrong agency into operation. If the sitting Member in this body knowingly turned loose an influence designed to control the election—and no one will contend that this money was expended for any other purpose than that of controlling the election—if he put it into operation, from the hour that he did so the duty devolves upon him to show that the use made of it was a legitimate use. I think I will be able to satisfy this body, if time will permit, that that is the rule which ought to obtain and that it is the fair and safe rule. It has always been the rule until we reached that refined state of sophistry where we have been busy in devising plausible arguments to excuse those who use money for corrupting influences.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. That was the rule distinctly stated by the committee at the very beginning of this trial, that it did not raise the presumption, but it put the party spending the money to proof of its legitimacy. If the Senator has not already seen that in the record, I can refer him to it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am of the opinion that I saw that in the record, and I have no doubt that either consciously or subconsciously it has affected me in making up my conclusion, because I have a very high regard for anything that this committee says upon any matter, and I do not disagree with it, but entirely agree with it.

Before passing, Mr. President, from this particular feature of the general discussion, may I call attention to the language of Justice Miller, where this subject matter of the purity of elections was before the court? Mr. Justice Miller in the somewhat noted case of Ex parte Yarbrough stated that the two great natural enemies of all republics are open violence and insidious corruption. He said:

> In a republican Government, like ours, where political power is reposed in representatives of the entire body of the people, chosen at short intervals by popular elections, the temptation to control these elections by violence and by corruption is a constant source of danger. Such has been the history of all republics, and, though ours has been comparatively free from both these evils in the past, no lover of his country can shut his eyes to the fear of future danger from both sources. * * * The free use of money in elections, arising from the vast growth of recent wealth in other quarters, presents equal cause for anxiety.

And I might read further with equal benefit.

How fast we are traveling, Mr. President, along this road may perhaps be best measured by the span of a distinguished career lately closed. Senator Frye was no demagogue; he shrank from the sensational; he had a very firm faith in the value and the permanency of our institutions; he did not take a very active part in the last years of his life in matters political, but he reflected deeply, as everyone knows, upon the political tendencies of our time. During his career here in the Senate he denounced in unmeasured terms the expenditure of $15,000 in a senatorial campaign. The amount itself was sufficient to arouse the fears and to call for the censure and condemnation of this distinguished Senator, and yet he lived to see $100,000 expended in a single canvass and lived to hear men justify it as a probable, possible, legitimate expenditure.

I do not know, in reflecting upon the rapidity of our movement in this direction, where we are going to draw the line, and how, as we shall finally establish the precedents, we are going to prove corruption at all. In the last session of this body some seven or eight men came before a Senate committee and admitted to individual corruption in a legislature, shamefully confessed the taking of a bribe for the casting of their vote, and Senators rejected the statements and testimony of those men because they were confessed bribe takers. So we established the precedent at the last session of this body that, though the members of the legislature come forward and confess to the taking of the bribe, there must be sufficient testimony outside in order to justify a denial of the seat; that there must be some honest testimony, as if there would be any honest witnesses present at the giving and the taking of a bribe. Now, we are about to say, in practical effect, that there shall be no limit as to the amount.

With the eyewitnesses and the personal participants rejected as unworthy of belief, with the amount unlimited, and with the doctrine just announced here upon the floor of the Senate by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] that you must individualize and brand the individual voters who may have been corrupted, how, under the precedents that we are fast establishing, shall we ever inhibit a man taking a seat in this body who has poured a fortune into the electorate of his State and in every way used money to control an election? What will be the final judgment and the ultimate precedent of the Senate of the United States under such rapid movement as we are making now in the direction of the expenditure of money used for the purpose of controlling elections?

Mr. President, there is a different rule. It is a plain and simple one, and it has been announced in the decisions of our courts and by legislative bodies, including this one, time and time again. If we will get back to those old, original, settled, honest rules, some of which I shall discuss before I take my seat, and apply them, there will be no difficulty in ascertaining what man is legitimately entitled to his seat and who is not.

There are two questions presented by this record. The first is, May we inquire into the use of money at a primary? Is the expenditure of money at a primary election a matter of concern to this body when it is inquiring into the legitimacy of the election which afterwards take place in the legislature? Secondly, after we have determined whether we may inquire into the expenditure of money at the primary, then we inquire, as a matter of fact, what was the amount of money used, how was it expended, and what was the effect of its expenditure upon the primary? These are the two main propositions presented by the record.

I might say, Mr. President, that I could agree in a very large measure with the argument of the Senator from New York on several points so far as the law is concerned; I only disagree with him when he comes to apply the admitted legal propositions which he makes to the facts in this case. When he admits, as I understand him to admit, that the corruption of the primary may be so extensive as to affect the legislative vote, it seems to me he must suffer the charge of inconsistency when he afterwards lays stress upon the necessity of singling out the particular vote corrupted.

It is important to remember that a primary election, while not provided for by the Constitution of the United States, still is not affirmatively prohibited by the Constitution. It is not in itself immoral, but is a perfectly proper way by which the people may exert a moral influence upon the legislature. The Constitution provides that the legislature may elect and must elect, but the means by which the legislature, through moral suasion or otherwise, may be brought to elect one person rather than another is left open, and the primary is one of the methods by which that result may be brought about.

It is admitted, of course, as stated by the Senator from New York, that our power extends no further than to judge of the election. That will be conceded as a basis of any argument that we may make, but I maintain that in judging of the election we may inquire, first, into everything which operated upon or served to bring about the result which was obtained when the ballot was finally cast, and, second, that our authority is not confined to an inquiry concerning the actual facts at the time of the casting of the vote, but that we may go back and locate every substantial means by which the final result was obtained or controlled. Whatever operated upon or exerted an influence upon the vote so as to bring about the particular result is a subject of legitimate inquiry under our power of judging of elections. The means by which this influence was exerted may not be a means known to or recognized by the law——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment; when I finish the sentence—in fact, it is more likely, if it is a corrupt influence or means, to be outside of the law, but it is sufficient if it operated in a substantial way to bring about the formal acts required by the law. I now yield to my colleague.

Mr. HEYBURN. One of the members of the legislature testified that he was friendly to Senator STEPHENSON; that his friendship was of long standing, and that he had worked for him for 25 years. There was the relation of employer and employee. Would that disqualify that employee, being elected to the legislature, from voting for Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think so, Mr. President; but I have no doubt from this record that if Mr. STEPHENSON had not received the nomination at the hands of the primary that good friend of his would have to have been content to vote for somebody else.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not intend to interrupt often, perhaps not all again, but if the Senator will analyze the vote that was cast on the 26th day of January in the separate houses he will find that he may eliminate every man who claims, or whom it is claimed was influenced by the action of the primary, and Senator STEPHENSON still had a majority.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, my judgment from this record is that if Mr. STEPHENSON had not received a majority at the primary he would not have been a candidate before the legislature at all, and he would not have received a single vote from the Legislature of Wisconsin. He would not have been there at the running. The man who received the highest vote would himself undoubtedly have received the vote of that legislature. It is not a question of whether one individual or two individuals might have been in favor of the election of Mr. STEPHENSON, but it is a question of what influence operated upon the legislature as a whole to make him the sole candidate of his party before that legislature and thus control the entire legislature.

I believe it to be a sound proposition, therefore, that if a primary is so treated and so regarded by the voters and the candidates, that it exerts a substantial controlling influence upon the legislative body, then any candidate who has corrupted the primary or secured its controlling influence through the use of money must suffer his seat to be declared vacant.

These things are clearly proven, in my judgment, by this record:

First, that there was a primary provided for by the State law and recognized by the candidates for the Senate as one of the substantial influences by which the legislature could be controlled and induced to vote for the man who received the highest vote at the primary.

Second. That both the voters and the candidates considered the primary as morally binding upon the legislature.

Third. That as an actual fact the legislature, not because of legal obligation, but as a moral obligation, treated the primary as binding, and felt constrained to act in accordance with the result of the primary.

Fourth. That the evidence that the sitting member regarded it as binding and conclusive is found in the fact that he put $107,000 into the primary in order to have the binding force and the controlling effect of that primary upon his legislature.

Fifth. It is perfectly clear from the record that without the primary vote which had been secured by the use of money, as we contend, upon the part of Senator STEPHENSON, Senator STEPHENSON would not have been elected and would not have been a candidate before the legislature.

Sixth. It can not be said that an influence so conclusive in bringing about the result in the legislature could be corrupted without the corruption affecting the body upon which it operated and which formally cast the vote which secured the election.

Seventh. Is it not a clear and conclusive proposition that if the instrument or means by which an election is brought about or controlled or substantially influenced be corrupted the election itself can not be clean?

If the influence which finally controlled the legislature, whether legitimately under the provisions of law or simply as a moral and supposedly binding obligation, is secured through the means of corruption, can it be contended that the election itself can be clean? I do not care, so far as my view of the law is concerned, whether those men who voted in the legislature were familiar with all the facts by means of which that public opinion had been formed and crystallized or not; I do not care whether they were a part of the scheme by which to control the popular opinion, because I stand upon the proposition laid down by Members of this body many years ago, that if A, B, and C agree to vote as D votes, and the candidate for the Senate buys D, he has corrupted all of them. If I in good faith believe that the people whom I represent in the State legislature have directed through their expression of preference that I shall vote for a certain candidate for the Senate; if, acting in the best of faith, I obey that public opinion freely and innocent of any wrongdoing; and if it turns out, nevertheless, that that public opinion has been controlled and secured—misleading me and deceiving me—by the use of money, I do not believe that it is a sound principle of law or of morals that my vote can serve the man who thus corrupted it and who has misled and deceived me as a member of the legislature. I do not see how it can be contended, even in an A, B, C school of morals, that if I go forth and corrupt an influence which finally affects an innocent man, I can then claim the benefit of the corrupting act of which I have been guilty. Such doctrine is not applied in any court of law and has never been applied in any body that has ever had it up for consideration.

Take, for instance, as an illustration, a caucus. Suppose there are three or four candidates in Wisconsin for the Senatorship, they having no primary. Suppose they say among themselves, "We will agree to call a Republican caucus, and the result of the caucus shall be binding upon us; we will accept its result." The caucus is unknown to the law; it is unknown to the Constitution; and in the condition in which it got to be it was unknown to morals. Will anyone contend that if a candidate for the Senate had corrupted a portion of that caucus sufficient to control it, and as a result of that he had been elected, every vote cast was not invalid as against his right to a seat? It is not necessary to limit it to the particular vote which was corrupted or purchased, but they have so combined and constructed the machinery of election as to make it controlling over a body, a large portion of which may be honest.

A primary is nothing more or less, so far as the record in this case is concerned, than a popular caucus. It has been popularized for the purpose of getting the opinion of the people generally as to who should be their candidate for Senator. Will not the same influence, operating upon the primary that operated upon the caucus which invalidated its action, be accredited the same effect when you come to cast the final vote in the legislature, knowing as we do from this record that the legislature voted in obedience to the popular election? If, therefore, the Senator from Wisconsin, through the use and influence of money, secured a vote which he otherwise would not have secured, is it not perfectly clear that everything which resulted from the dictates of that corrupt influence must fall?

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] says that he objects to holding the Senator responsible for what A and B may get together and do, and contends that their action can not in any wise affect the action of C. Those are not the facts in this case at all. The facts disclosed by this record are these—that the sitting Member authorized his financial agent to secure the popular vote; was himself the author and the active party; made it possible to do that which was done; and, by reason of securing the popular vote, himself controlled innocent members of the legislature. He is not, therefore, in a position to contend that his acts are the acts of an innocent party or that he is being made responsible for the acts of guilty parties, of which he had no guilty knowledge.

I wish to call attention very briefly to one or two statements, or perhaps more, in the brief filed by the very able counsel for the sitting Member, as the position of the claimant of the seat is there stated as clearly as it has been stated at all. This brief, page 11, says:

(A) The primary election for the nomination for United States Senator has no legal or constitutional connection with the election of United States Senator, and the Senate has no legal right to investigate such primary election. Nothing done therein can affect the election of a Senator.

Now, as a proposition of law, of course that is true. As a fact it is not in accordance with the record here. It is most clearly shown that as a fact the primary did "affect the election of a Senator." It controlled the election. If he had not won in the primary he would have had practically no chance to win in the legislature. As a fact I say the primary did control the legislature. The candidates for the Senate considered that it should do so and were bound or were considered to be bound by it.

Again, it is said:

In the primary election a candidate for Senator is nominated by the people at an election by the people. A nomination by the people at a primary is not binding upon the legislature. At the most it is only advisory, a mere recommendation.

So is a caucus.

If, however, by a nomination in a primary the people can confine the election by the legislature to the person selected by them at the primary, then by an act of the State legislature they have to that extent amended the Constitution as they would to that extent control the election and emasculate the right of the legislature to select its candidate at will.

As a simple proposition of law that is undoubtedly well and correctly stated, but what has it to do with the fact that as a fact in the record the legislature obeyed the popular vote and accepted as it were this popular vote as a petition to the legislature to select a certain candidate? They could have rejected the action of this primary. They could have refused to be bound by it. But everyone understood that they were to be bound by it, and as an actual fact they consented to be bound by it.

The only question now properly before the Senate—

Says the distinguished attorney—

The only question now properly before the Senate is, "Was Senator STEPHENSON legally elected?" not "Was he legally nominated?"

But he was not legally elected under the facts disclosed in the record unless he was legally nominated. If the primary was illegal by being corrupted, then it operated corruptly upon the body which felt constrained to follow the popular vote.

I want to digress for just a few moments from a discussion of the legal proposition to a discussion of the primary which has been criticized here. I do not know that it has any particular pertinency to the discussion, and I certainly should not detain the Senate in discussing the subject if it had not been so thoroughly discussed by those who seem to be opposed to the system. Our friends who are opposed to the primary have taken this opportunity to assail the primary system. With that excess of pleasure characteristic of a belated joy they point out how it fails to do, what no one ever contended it would do, make all candidates decent and all men honest. You had just as well declaim against the whole moral law of Sinai and the statutes which define and punish crime, because after 3,000 years, notwithstanding these statutes, men still commit crimes. Our friends exclaim in unrestrained derision that notwithstanding your primary law corruption still lives—omitting to state the most important fact that though it still lives it stands exposed. Under the old system river franchises, agricultural colleges, Federal patronage, the people's interests in good legislation were exchanged and bartered and traded for Senatorships, and it was not so bad because it was done in the dark and seldom capable of proof. The old system was based upon the Machiavellian philosophy that that which is not known does not in fact exist. The new system is based upon the proposition that that which exists is bound to be known. When a vice must stand exposed its end is near, for be it said to the honor and glory of Christian America, our people will not long brook the exposed iniquities of injustice and wrong. If the cruelties of slavery could have been concealed it would have lasted a thousand years; its iniquities exposed it had to die. Corruption can not live under the primary system if men have the courage, as they will have, to punish those who stand exposed. A primary system accompanied with a corrupt-practice act will make it impossible to control our elections by the use of money. There is no way for corruption to escape exposure, and I repeat, exposure it can not endure. Senator STEPHENSON could have put a million into a caucus and brought his purchased parchment of election here and the chances would have been one in ten thousand that it would have ever been known—and unknown we would in our ignorance have regarded the hideous cancer eating away at the vitals of the Nation as health. But he put in a hundred thousand dollars, and even without an efficient corrupt-practice act and with an attempt to destroy original memoranda the exposure is nevertheless complete, and the only thing now left to be determined is the judgment and the courage of the Senate.

The most remarkable plea against the primary is that it compels men to spend money—that it takes these hard-headed, shrewd, long-experienced business men and compels them, like Dick Turpin on the London Road, to stand and deliver. What a pathetic scene; how it moves the very bowels of pity to see this law operating upon these men of wealth, driving them against their wishes into all the ecstasies and excesses of reckless spendthrifts. I shall not embarrass him by exposing by name his virtues here, but I know of one Senator who holds a seat here who made a campaign at a primary for Senator in a large State against a man many times a millionaire, and he spent less than a thousand dollars and was nominated. And I need not stop with this Senator. I could multiply instances. If a man represents money in the race it will cost money to run. If he has nothing to give the people but money, then money he must give them. But if he represents some question of great moment, if he has something to say to the people upon a subject worthy of their attention, if he deals in ideas and issues instead of patronage and checks, he will win over all the money you can put into the fight. One of the very things for which I hold Senator STEPHENSON responsible in this campaign is that he entered the race with his bank account for his platform. He says himself that after he turned his financial agents loose without limit as to the amount or as to the use he seldom went near headquarters and met the people in no public gathering, discussed with them no matter of great concern. His opponents made the mistake of permitting him to name the weapons or fix the rules of the game and he defeated them. My friend who made the race in another State fixed the rules of the game himself. He demanded an issue, made it, and won. Is there any wonder that there is always at work with the stubborn, fatal persistence of the glacier the determination to go back to the old system? But lay not that flattering unction to your soul, we are not going back.

They tell us that the primary has destroyed the party—that there was some virtue, some singular virtue, "the close contriver of all harms" in this old caucus system which held a great political party together. Nothing has been taken away under the primary system really except the power of the caucus. What was there wrapped up in this irresponsible force in politics which held in its keeping the life of our great political parties?

My friends, if it were true that our political parties had reached the point where, like other institutions in this country, they could not stand the sunlight of publicity, they would shortly die and the country would rejoice at their going. If it were true that policies and principles had ceased to hold the party together, if its members were no longer united because of their common faith in some great question of economics or government, of humanity or justice, the usefulness of party would be at an end and it ought not to be saved even if a caucus system of spoils and barter, of trade and dicker, could save it. For I assert that a more vicious, treacherous, subtle, venal influence never operated to the detriment of the people than the old caucus system in our politics.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. For information I inquire whether or not the Senator has knowledge of any instance in which a majority of the voters expressed themselves at the primaries—and I make no exceptions. If my assumption is correct that it is only a minority that expresses itself at the primaries, then the proposition seems to be that of minority rule. I am not in favor of it. I do not know how the Senator would feel upon that proposition.

Mr. BORAH. I would rather have majority rule than minority rule, but if I have to have a minority rule I would like to get it as large as possible. I would rather have 190,000 voters in Wisconsin express themselves than to have 15 men in the back room of a dive controlling the whole situation.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am thoroughly in sympathy with that. I never did believe in back-room caucuses. The Senator himself knows that as well as I do.

Mr. BORAH. I am not going to discuss with the Senator what he believes and what I believe, except as it is called out by questions. But while it is claimed that the primary calls out only a minority vote, it always calls out thousands more than a caucus to express themselves. The beauty to some of the old system was that when a man dealt with a caucus the people did not know anything about it, and he could trade and deal and barter in any way he desired, while if he deals with the popular vote or if he expends his money in a popular campaign he must eventually be exposed, as this campaign shows.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have never been partial to caucuses, and I should be glad to eliminate them from our political system.

Mr. BORAH. I am glad the Senator discloses that much progress.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not coming. I have always been there.

Mr. BORAH. I am sure if my colleague was ever there he is there still.

Mr. HEYBURN. The right of to-day is the right of all times. The right does not change with every season.

Mr. BORAH. That is true, but I would rather have my face to the dawn than always to the sunset.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a very pretty sentiment, but a man who never looked at a sunset has missed a whole lot, in my judgment.

Mr. BORAH. I have seen the sun set more often than I have seen it rise. But it must be understood that my remarks in regard to the caucus were not personal. They were general. I know that my colleague would not have anything to do with so corrupting an influence in politics as an ordinary caucus.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, yes; I would.

Mr. BORAH. I was really inclined to believe if I stated the opposite of it my colleague would take the opposite side.

Mr. HEYBURN. It does not follow at all, because I do not believe in the kind of a caucus referred to by my colleague as being held in the back room of a saloon—was it?—that I am not in favor of Members getting together for consultation. I have heard of all sorts of vile things being done in a caucus, and I have known other instances where far different results came from them.

Mr. BORAH. So rare that history has seldom recorded it. But I presume that personal views in this body are of little worth on either side, so far as experiences are concerned.

But, Mr. President, I deny that the primaries have disorganized our parties. Did the primary system destroy the Federalist Party? It went to pieces even while the superlative genius of a Hamilton wrought in its behalf. No; the old Federalist Party became drunk with power, drifted away from the masses, and in the excesses of its inebriation forgot that this is a government of the many and not of the few, even though those few be endowed, as were the leaders of the Federalist Party, with unusual and superior powers. Did the primaries destroy the old Whig Party, led so long by Clay and Webster? No; the Whig Party lost its courage. It dared not announce a policy concerning the crime of slavery. It was without a plan. It was drifting upon the political sea. The countless millions in this country, plain people, were in advance of their leaders. The old Whig Party, rotting at the top, fell to pieces because it could not crystallize into a platform or into policies the restless moral forces of an aroused and determined people. Parties come and go, live and die. They come with a message, and they go when they cease to have a message. They live so long as they offer to the voters a concrete and constructive plan with which to deal with human interests and human welfare. They die when, abandoning all principle and all policies, they fall into a contest over position and power and engage alone in the personal rows of ambitious leaders.

Mr. HEYBURN. May I ask the Senator if he meant that possibly, in his judgment, the Republican Party has ceased to have a function to perform?

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no. The Republican Party is in favor of a primary. It is proceeding to do business in the right way and has a great future, I hope.

Mr. HEYBURN. Where is that Republican Party to be found that is in favor of a primary?

Mr. BORAH. Part of it is now in evidence.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. KERN. I wish to suggest that it is to be found to-day in Indianapolis. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not know the Republican Party was in Indianapolis to-day. I had not read the afternoon papers.

Mr. KERN. There are two of them.

Mr. BORAH. The remains, I suppose, is all there will be left in the morning.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Idaho to speak of the want of union and harmony in the two old parties? I was under the impression that there was only one divided party now, and it is divided into as many parts as Gaul had at the time of Cæsar's invasion.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is not referring to his own party, I presume as——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I refer to the three fragments of the old Republican Party.

Mr. BORAH. I presume the Senator from New York would not be willing to confine the different parts in his party to the number three. I know of four, and they are all pretty good parts. I hope they will stay just as far apart as they are now.

I think the disorganized and wrangling condition of both the old parties is not difficult of diagnosis. It needs neither seer nor prophet to see the cause of the trouble or foretell the results if things are not changed. The greatest problem since 1860, if not since 1787, is the problem of restoring competition to the American market place. If competition is not to be restored then of devising some practical scheme of regulation and control which will lift from the backs of men the burden placed there through extortion and fraud. You can postpone and compromise, you can side-step and trim, but this question is here, and it will have to be settled and settled right. The people understand perfectly that this question is here and they see nor hear of no intelligent plan to solve it. The sons of the sturdy men who sat restless about the American hearthstone in the fifties waiting for that strange voice laden with sympathy but firm in tone, the voice from the prairies of Illinois—not from the cities or colleges, but from the open field where men mingle their thought with their labor—are now waiting for some one who will submit a plan and announce a faith. If you want men to take part in politics give them something to fight for, some intelligent, concrete proposition which they can get hold of and in which they can believe. You can buy a few of the people at any time, but you can not buy all the people any of the time. If you want them to march as they marched of old then give them the clear and distinct issues as of old. What are we doing with these questions? Both parties are drifting. Let me tell you that the political party which gives to the people the clear and definite policy in its platform in the next campaign upon the proper regulation and control of these forces which now control prices and puts upon the platform a man whose character is a guaranty that the pledge made will be kept will win—it is immaterial under what name or under what banner the announcement is made—it will win.

I hope to see and I believe I will see the party of which I am a member take advanced grounds on this question.

But we are told, let us revise the tariff—that is the way to get relief. Let us assume for the sake of the argument that our protective tariff policy is wrong; let us assume for the sake of the argument that a tariff for revenue is indeed the proper tariff. Or let us go the limit and assume that this miserable mongrel and contemptible subterfuge, protection for the manufacturer and free trade for the producer—free raw material—protection for the East and an open market for the West—let us take this modern theory, which turns Mason and Dixon line north and south instead of east and west, let us assume that even that is respectable. What relief are the people going to get if the American market place is in the absolute control of a power which fixes prices?

They said to us western people during the Payne-Aldrich bill discussion, If you will put hides upon the free list we will give you cheaper shoes. We were then realizing $2,000,000 per annum on hides in the way of revenue. We put hides on the free list. Shoes went up, hides went down, and we lost the $2,000,000 revenue, which the people must make up in some other way.

Not a single article on which the tariff was reduced fell in price. Not a single article placed on the free list fell in price. If you take off all the duty and it does not lower the price, will some tariff expert tell me how much duty you will have to take off in order to lower the price? The combinations took up every cent of the millions of revenue which we lost. The first and prime duty is to clear the market place of these combinations and take away this power to extort prices, and until we do so we will but trifle with the rights of the people.

Mr. President, we have noticed in this country for years that the voters do not go to the polls either upon election day or at the primaries. It is an extraordinary condition of affairs when the great State represented by the distinguished Senators from New York leave 100,000 of the best citizens at home the day we elect a ruler for this great Nation. There must be some reason for it aside from the fact that Idaho or a few States have a primary.

The fact is, Mr. President, that the people do not feel that the issue is so presented that by taking part they can accomplish anything; they feel that it is a sham battle as to both parties.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question, he having made the remark in regard to Idaho having a primary? Does not the Senator know that Idaho has a primary for the same reason that sometimes you let a child touch a hot stove, in order to convince it that it is hot? Does he not know that the men who gave Idaho its present ridiculous primary law did it in order to satisfy by experience the clamor of a lot of men who did not belong to the Republican Party and were willing to do anything that would create discord in it? Idaho will not have a direct primary after the passage of the campaign in which the Senator will be interested. No one proposes to disturb it during that campaign, but that will be the last of it. We will then see no direct primary.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know of a higher compliment one Senator could pay to another than that which my distinguished colleague has paid to me. I said once before on the floor of the Senate I would not have been here if we had not had in effect a primary, and I would not expect to return if we did not have it. I am, as I must be permitted to say, since the matter has been made so personal, distinctly proud of the fact that in order to return I must rely on a popular vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does not the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BACON. I should like to divert for a moment the attention of the honorable Senator from his direct line of argument to a word which fell from him which did not entirely comport with what I understand to be generally his views, and I want to know whether it was accidental or premeditated. I should like to ask the honorable Senator what officer of this Government he considers to be the ruler of the country. The Senator said that 100,000 men in New York had abstained from going to the polls when a ruler of this country was to be elected. I want to know what officer that is. Wherever there is a ruler there must be subjects of that ruler.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, the Senator knows that I used the word ruler in a different sense from that in which he now is using it. Yet I am not sure but what as time goes on we may take on a little more of what constitutes a ruler. I shall regret it, but that is one of the things which may come.

Mr. BACON. I quite recognize that, and it was that apprehension which made me a little jealous of the expression of the Senator, knowing his views generally, as I think I do, that he should use such an expression in connection with any officer connected with the American Government. I do not think that we have any ruler, and I do not think that the term ought to be applied to an officer of this Government, even unguardedly. For that reason I took the liberty of interrupting the honorable Senator to make the inquiry of him whether he really thinks there is any officer of the American Government who should be called a ruler.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, perhaps I was led on by what is known in these days as the subconscious influence upon consciousness. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. I accept the Senator's explanation. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. But I was reading some time ago a remarkable statement by the great English commoner, John Bright. He used that term in connection with our President, and possibly it was that subconscious influence. While I am upon that subject, if the Senator will permit me, I desire to quote a single line or two from the great English commoner in order to escape if possible from the dilemma in which the Senator from Georgia seems to have placed me. John Bright, in referring at one time to our presidential election, said:

> Every four years there springs from the vote created by the people a President over that great Nation.
> I think the world offers no finer spectacle than this; it offers no higher dignity; and there is no greater object or ambition on the political stage on which man could be permitted to move. You may point, if you will, to hereditary rulers, to crowns coming down through successive generations in the same family, to thrones based on prescription or upon conquest, to scepters wielded over veteran legions or subject realms; but to my mind there is nothing so worthy of reverence and obedience, nothing more sacred than the authority of the freely chosen by the majority of a great and free people; and if there be on earth and among men any right divine to govern, surely it rests with a ruler so chosen and so appointed.

It was in that sense I used the word "ruler."

Mr. BACON. I suppose, Mr. President, that the honorable Senator means that as the people of this country are the rulers, and that the man who as the Executive represents the one hundred million who thus rule themselves, occupies a very high and honorable position, than which there is no higher; and in that sense I will be glad to accept it, but not in any sense which will attach to the office the power to rule as it has always been understood in times of kings and autocrats.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will simply say to the Senator that the discussion may close without any doubt, I hope, that I do not believe in a "beneficent despot."

Mr. BACON. I was a little afraid the Senator was rather using the language in the apprehension of what might be in the near future.

Mr. BORAH. I think in all probability that is liable to happen, so far as the nomination of the gentleman is concerned to whom the Senator from Georgia is now referring. I hope it will at least.

Mr. BACON. I sincerely hope the Senator will be disappointed in that regard.

Mr. HEYBURN. May I ask the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment. I must be permitted to say before we pass from this subject that every time one of my good Democratic friends refers to a certain party in this country as a candidate for President he assumes that, if nominated, he is going to be elected in spite of anything that may be done to prevent it.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I want to say that I had not mentioned parties before.

Mr. BORAH. That is another case of subconsciousness. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. While I in a measure criticized the use of the word "ruler" by the Senator I very highly appreciate the very great compliment he paid immediately theretofore to the Democratic Party when he said that a party only came when it had a message to deliver, something to accomplish, and when the time passed when it had no message to deliver the party disappeared. That was certainly a very high encomium on the Democratic Party which, among all other political mutations, has survived more than a hundred years in spite of long-continued defeat.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is a distinguished member of a great party, but it has not delivered a message within 50 years. [Laughter.] I hasten to admit it has earnestly endeavored to do so.

Mr. BACON. I want to say to the honorable Senator and to the Senate that it has continued to deliver a message, and that it has for a hundred years and more been faithful to that message. Although it has had, except for a brief period, no patronage to give out during 50 years in order to keep its adherents faithful to its organization, it has continued to deliver a message, and in spite of defeat it is delivering a message to-day, the great message of the right of every man in this country to equal opportunities, and that there shall be special privileges to none. And that message the Democratic Party will continue to deliver, however long the Senator from Idaho may close his ears to it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in respect to the message just now delivered by so prominent a member of the Democratic Party, I agree with it most heartily. The trouble is that it seems the majority of the American people do not hear the message when it is thus delivered.

Mr. BACON. That is their mistake, which they are beginning to realize.

Mr. BORAH. I am not going to deny that just now. I want my friend to enjoy for a season the pleasure.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are two things that an inadvertence caused me to lose. First, I did not catch the name of the gentleman referred to by my colleague, and probably the same gentleman was referred to by the Senator from Georgia in speaking of the future.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, we are unable to hear on this side.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not catch the name. My attention was distracted. Would the Senator mind repeating or stating the name?

Mr. BORAH. I did not state the name. I did not want to cause a demonstration here by mentioning a name which was liable to excite such risibility in the galleries, and so forth. But I had reference, of course, to Col. Roosevelt.

Mr. HEYBURN. I supposed so. Now, if the Senator agrees with the Senator from Georgia that a great message has come to the people, would he object to having that message read as a part of his remarks or made an appendix to his printed speech that may possibly be sent out?

Mr. BORAH. I am perfectly willing that any message the Senator from Georgia delivers shall go into my speech. It would grace it and strengthen it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I assume there is some visible message that has been sent by somebody somewhere.

Mr. BACON. We are rather unfortunate on this side of the Chamber. The Senator had his back turned to us and we could not hear him; but we suppose he was talking to his colleague something about Col. Roosevelt.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I was not. I was only making an inquiry.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to go back by way of diversion to the subject matter under discussion. There has been so much said in the Senate Chamber and elsewhere about the disorganized condition of both our parties, that I was going to make a suggestion with reference to it which I prefer to conclude rather than to let it go unsaid.

Of course, the contention is made by those who are opposed to the primaries and such means of securing popular judgment that the condition of parties at this time is the result of these laws, but as I view it, the conditions politically are not a result of primary laws or of any matters which might be considered as kindred to them. The condition results from the fact, in my judgment, that we have not ourselves, either in one or the other party, agreed upon a policy with reference to those things about which the American people are constantly thinking.

Now, Mr. President, just a few words on another feature of this question, and then, having been detained and having detained, I will close without discussing in detail some court decisions which I had intended to discuss.

Mr. President, the facts in this case have been so thoroughly discussed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] and by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and other Senators that I am not going to take long in the discussion of them. But I want to say a few words in the way of application of the facts to the legal principles which I stated in the beginning of my remarks.

In the first place the Senator elect put $107,000 into this campaign. That money went into the campaign inside of about 60 days. One hundred and seven thousand dollars naturally excites inquiry or arrests our attention, and we begin to ask at once, "What use was made of such a large sum of money?" I do not say that the putting of $107,000 into the campaign would of itself raise such a presumption that you would be warranted in drawing a conclusive judgment against the Senator. I do not wish to take that position. But it must be conceded that if that amount is brought to the attention of anyone he naturally and at once inquires what use could have been made of it. The amount is such that you at once conclude that it could not have been legitimately used in that time. Secondly, what was the purpose of putting so large an amount in the campaign? What did the one who put it in the campaign understand the probable effect of it would be? Why was it expended, and what did they understand would be the result of the expenditure?

It was not a campaign of public discussion such as the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] intimated was going on and the expenses of which had to be paid. It is not unfair to say, because the record bears it out, that the Senator entered the campaign with a determination to win it through the influence of money. He says himself that after he turned his financial agents loose without any limit upon the amount or any direction as to the use he gave little attention to the election. He went about his business, expecting and believing that his money and his agents would control the primary. He placed this large amount of money at their disposal with the understanding that his agents should control that election. That was just as much an understanding upon the part of the man who put the money into the coffers of those who were doing the work as if it were written in this record, "I instruct you to go out and get this primary." Furthermore, there was no limit upon the amount which was to be used. It was not a question of money; it was a question of getting a result by means of the use of money.

I maintain that that of itself placed the Senator in a position where from that time he must disclose to the satisfaction of this record and of the Senate that the money was used in a legitimate way.

Now, what is the result? In the first place, one of the things which was put forward in the record as a defense upon the part of the Senator—and in the very beginning of the hearing—was, "I gave them $107,000, but I do not know what went with it nor what they did with it." I undertake to say that, as a matter of morals and bearing directly upon this matter, he is not permitted to say to this body, "I do not know how this money was expended." There must be an accounting for it. I said a while ago that there were some settled rules in regard to these matters, which, if we would apply, would be controlling and enable us to arrive at a just and righteous conclusion. Where this large amount of money is put into the campaign I maintain it devolves upon the Senator to show that it was used in a legitimate manner.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me to call attention to the rule which was established by the committee, and see whether or not it meets with his approval? I read from page 281. Mr. Littlefield, who was representing Senator STEPHENSON, challenged a statement made by the chairman in regard to the presumption, and said:

> Then the presumption of innocent expenditure does not follow the item.
> The CHAIRMAN. The presumption of innocence does not enter into the question at all. The expenditure being challenged as to its legality, there is no presumption that money expended in connection with an individual campaign by a candidate for office is rightfully expended after it is challenged in an official way.

The line was drawn there. Community talk that the money had been wrongfully expended does not put the party to proof, but we were confronted with the challenge that came here under the seal of the State of Wisconsin and the signature of its governor, and that was the rule laid down and the rule followed by the committee in this case.

Mr. BORAH. But the large amount put into the campaign did not stand alone. In the first place, as I have already called attention to the fact, he does not seek to control the use of it. In the second place, the sitting Member can not account for the use of it. The agents can not say to us what they did with it. They are not in a position to explain how it was used. It is not alone that he refuses to be responsible for its use, but his agents themselves are unable to account to the committee as to the manner in which the money was used.

Thirdly, the memoranda showing the manner in which this money was used were destroyed. The evidence, which should have been kept with vigilance and with care, is not only permitted to be lost, but the testimony, in my judgment, shows that it was willfully destroyed. Upon what theory was the destruction had? What could be the motive if the money had been legitimately used? It must have been a consciousness upon the part of those who had expended it that the memoranda, if kept, would be conclusive proof as to the manner in which the money was used. One of the strongest evidences of guilt in any transaction is the fact that the party destroys the evidence which, if in existence, would prove his innocence, or, on the part of the public, if in existence, would prove his guilt.

It does not seem to me that the distinguished Senator who has preceded me is permitted to leave this before the Senate with the naked fact that $107,000 was expended and that we are not permitted to draw a definite conclusion from that fact. There are, in addition, the surrounding circumstances and environment, the method of dealing with this great fund and of dealing with the evidence, all disclosed in this record. Will the Senate of the United States pass over a record which discloses the putting of a bank into a campaign, the destruction of evidence, the refusal to account for the use of the money, or to direct its use as one of the instances which has been referred to by the Senator from New York as creating no presumption against the claimant for the seat? Not only the memoranda but the original records are gone. They were carried out of the State; they were placed beyond the control and jurisdiction of the legislature, secreted, hidden away.

Here is another significant fact: A bank was made financial agent; no check books were used; no bank account opened. These men were given the money. It was not a case of checking against an account, where the checks might be gotten hold of and disclose to whom the money went, and so forth; but these bankers there seemed to have had a fund which they used, and used in such a way as to conceal all records as to the manner of use. Every precaution was taken to cover the tracks of those who were making use of the money.

Mr. President, if they had been using this money for legitimate purposes, they would have been just as active to keep a record of that legitimate purpose. If they had spent the money for cigars, for writing letters, for brass bands, paying for public halls, and for the things which are at least quasi legitimate in a campaign, they would have industriously preserved the record of that fact that there might be no question as to how the money was used; but, in my judgment, the moment the records disappeared, the bank account being unkept, the facts being in such a condition that no human being can state how this fortune went, there immediately devolves upon the sitting Member the responsibility of explaining to the Senate what became of it. Part of this money was given to members of the legislature. Three members of the legislature, who were necessary to a choice, if we consider Senator STEPHENSON'S election to have taken place the second time the vote was taken, received a part of this fund.

We have had the argument here—I do not desire to be understood as being personal—that these members of the legislature could take a part of this corruption fund and put it in this pocket for Mr. STEPHENSON and keep the money in their other pocket for the electorate who was voting for them and not feel under any obligation or influence or be controlled in any wise by that fund.

To what sophistry will we resort in order to excuse men who impeach themselves and place themselves beyond the pale of confidence by admitting that they took the money of a candidate for the United States Senate when they were candidates for the legislature? These three members were actively cooperating all the time with the forces which were controlling the electorate and had the money in their pockets which was a part of the corruption fund. Do you suppose that these men stood free, unbiased, and unprejudiced as voters in that legislative body under those circumstances? Must we bring into the Senate the members of the legislature and have them admit that they were controlled and influenced by the use of money? If we do, Senators would immediately say that those men were unworthy of belief because they are confessed bribe takers, and we would be no better off than before. That is the record already before the Senate.

No arrangements were made for an itemized statement. There is not, to my mind, a single act upon the part of those who expended this money that can be harmonized with the belief or consciousness upon their part that they were using it legitimately. As to the manner in which they used it, paying it to individual voters, carrying them to and from the polls, and paying them for their time, the different methods by which they explain it, and so forth, that has already been discussed at such length that I shall not discuss it further.

I only want to say in concluding that if we find, as stated by the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Ohio and admitted, as I understand, to be the law by the Senator from New York, that when the primary is influenced and controlled by the use of money it may be inquired into for the purpose of rendering invalid the act of election in the legislature, then there is only one question here for us to determine, and that is whether or not this money wrought any influence upon the electorate which elected that legislature. There is only one proposition left for us to determine, if that legal proposition be admitted, and that is whether you can put $107,000 into that kind of a campaign and expend it in the manner in which it was expended, refuse to account for it, or to show its legitimate use, without the presumption that there was a corrupt influence operating upon the electorate body.

Mr. President, this is a serious matter. If we fail here to keep representative government clean and wholesome, how can we hope to preserve it? If there could ever come a time when association and friendship might warrant leniency in dealing with those who bring representative government into reproach, it is not now. Harsh and severe must be the judgments rendered against those who add weight to the charge that representative government is no longer in fact representative. These are times when men who will do or connive at the doing of those things which impeach representative government must be put aside as disloyal to the supreme obligations of the hour. Representative government, as it measures up in integrity and faithfulness to the conception and purpose of the fathers, is the wisest and most beneficent of all governments heretofore conceived or hereafter to be devised, and I confess that men who are indifferent to its worth or negligent of its preservation, men who for their own selfishness would discredit and debauch it, arouse in me a feeling of resentment akin to loathing. Men who buy votes or make it possible for others to corrupt the electorate and thus impeach and challenge our whole system of government, thus give credence and weight to the charge that it is breaking down, thus destroy the confidence of the people at large in the work and efficiency of our institutions, are not entitled to our protection here; they are not entitled to protection anywhere. They must take their place among those recreant to the highest obligations which can be imposed upon a man by his country. They are the real enemies of representative government. It is through their efforts that it will break down, if it does break down. I care nothing for the open, for the avowed advocate compared with the insidious, treacherous miner and sapper, working by day and by night under the very pillars of the Government. Others will do as their conscience dictates, but to my mind this evidence shows both the act and the intent, shows both the purpose and the accomplishment of the purpose, shows the plan to secure the seat here solely and wholly by the influence and use of money. And so believing, I must cast my vote in favor of declaring the seat vacant.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, inasmuch as certain Senators have given notice of their intention to speak, I do not ask for a vote now; but I desire at this time to ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday, the 27th of March—the calendar day which will be the equivalent of that—the Senate commence to vote upon the pending resolution and all amendments or substitutes without further debate.

Mr. SMOOT. What hour?

Mr. HEYBURN. Not later than that time.

Mr. ROOT. But what hour?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say at 4 o'clock.

Mr. BACON. If I may be pardoned for a suggestion to the Senator, we have already made a unanimous-consent agreement that we shall vote on this legislative day, and now, as I understand the Senator, his proposition is to change that unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the next legislative day?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; the equivalent time. I have not thought out a plan to express it, unless I should enumerate the hours that intervene. I might say "after so many hours," but by reference, for the convenience of expression, I have stated it upon that day. If any Senator can suggest any more accurate or preferable way of expressing it, well and good.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. We made a precisely similar agreement in voting upon the arbitration treaties, namely, that the vote should be taken not later than 4 o'clock on a given calendar day. That does not interfere with the legislative day.

Mr. BACON. No; I only made a suggestion. While I have no objection to the purpose the Senator has in view or to its accomplishment, I only made the statement in view of what, if I understood it correctly, I was afraid was inconsistent. I have no objection to the accomplishment of the Senator's desire, and that is, that we shall vote to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. Yes, that is right; let us vote to-morrow. The question can be put in that way just as well.

Mr. HEYBURN. We can state it in that way. Then I ask unanimous consent that not later than 4 o'clock to-morrow—yet that is just as objectionable technically—the Senate commence to vote upon the resolution and amendments.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, there are several of us on this side of the Chamber who want to speak on this question, and therefore I should not like to agree to set the hour definitely for a vote by 4 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Tennessee and to others that, if we can not fix an hour, it may result in our sitting here until very late to-morrow night, because we have another unanimous-consent agreement for Thursday. It seems to me it would be for the convenience of Senators to agree to some reasonable hour to-morrow to take this vote. We can take a recess until an earlier hour to-morrow and allow time for every Senator who so desires to speak; but I think we ought to make sure that we shall not come in conflict with the other unanimous-consent agreement for Thursday.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield in a moment. I want to complete the suggestion I was making. It would be well to dispose of this, because then we shall be in a position to consider the time we shall remain in session. If it is not possible to get an agreement, then I shall have to ask the Senate to sit continuously, because Senators have expressed their desire to speak, and they are entitled to consideration. Therefore, to state it concisely, my request is for unanimous consent to commence voting at 4 o'clock to-morrow. If we agree upon that, we shall then take up the consideration of how long we shall remain in session, and perhaps have a session to-night, and perhaps meet to-morrow at 10 o'clock, if Senators think that much time will be necessary in order to meet the situation which confronts us—that is to say, another special order.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in my opinion, the unanimous consent asked for infringes upon the unanimous-consent agreement under which we are acting. I do not intend to raise that point, but before consenting to naming an hour for the taking of a vote, I should like to be informed with some accuracy with respect to the number of Senators who desire to speak and about how long a time they desire to occupy. I intend at some time before the debate is over, if the spirit moves me, to say a few words upon the question, but I do not desire to intrude myself into the debate to the exclusion of Senators who are members of the committee and who have given great consideration to the subject. I simply want some information with regard to the probability of the length of the debate before I will consent to the naming of an hour for a vote. Does the Senator from Idaho know, approximately, the number of Senators who desire to speak?

Mr. HEYBURN. Only in a general way, but I will say the consideration of that question perhaps will come up more properly in connection with the determination of the hours that we shall sit.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. LEA. There are at least four Senators on this side of the Chamber who desire to speak. If the Senator from Idaho will pardon me, I will suggest that if the Senator will frame his request so that the vote will be taken not later than 6 o'clock to-morrow, the 27th of March, and a recess will be taken until noon to-morrow, I will not object.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no objection to yielding to that suggestion. The difference between 4 o'clock and 6 is not very considerable. It will take an hour to vote, or I assume it will take that long if a roll call is demanded upon all the substitutes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not hear the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee with respect to the time at which we shall convene to-morrow.

Mr. LEA. At noon to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. And vote not later than 6 o'clock?

Mr. LEA. Not later than 6 o'clock.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will suggest that we meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are four Senators upon the other side of the Chamber who desire to be heard?

Mr. LEA. There are at least four.

Mr. HEYBURN. How many are there on this side?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think those who desire to be heard ought to make it known, so that we may act in this matter intelligently.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire, before the vote is taken, to be heard briefly on this subject. I do not want to take very much time. I think I can get through with what I want to say in an hour. I suggest, if such an arrangement can be made, that we provide that Senators who are for and against the resolution may be heard alternately, so that if we finally reach the hour of voting some of those who are in favor and some of those who are against may not be deprived of the opportunity of being heard.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to know if we have had a full expression on this side as to the number of those who desire to speak.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I simply wanted to suggest that the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], who is not now present, expects to be heard.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. I wish to state that I may or may not desire to say a few words. For the motion of the Senator from Idaho I have offered a substitute, which is now on the table, but as another substitute has been offered for the resolution of the committee, it may not reach a vote. If I do speak, I will not consume more than 15 or 20 minutes at the outside. I want to suggest in this connection that it seems to me that it would be better to take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow rather than until 12 o'clock.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it is evident from the number of speeches already on the program that we can not expect to have them finished within the time that has been suggested—that is, between the hours of 12 and 6, unless Senators will agree to limit themselves a little.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, would it not be wise for us to go on this afternoon a little further? We may dispose of some of these speeches in that way. We have been in session now only three hours. I know part of the discussion has been wearisome, but we are laying out a program now that seems to contemplate an abandonment of the discussion after three hours to-day and taking eight hours to-morrow. We shall all be very tired before eight hours of discussion of this case is over to-morrow. The speeches to be made in the latter part of that time will be addressed chiefly to the RECORD, I think, and it seems to me that we had better go on and dispose of some part of the proposed observations to-day.

Mr. HEYBURN. I only had in mind an embarrassment which would probably arise within a very few minutes, perhaps, of some one suggesting to take a recess, and I wanted to anticipate it. Personally, I should be in favor of continuing this debate until the vote is taken, but I do not desire to insist upon an uncomfortable rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Chair understands, there is no suggestion pending that the Senate now take a recess. The Senator from Idaho has asked unanimous consent that a certain agreement be entered.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the Chair put the request for unanimous consent to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow and to vote at 6. I think the objections have been withdrawn.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Kansas allow the Secretary to state the request as the Chair understands it?

Mr. LEA. Do I understand the Senator from Idaho to put the hour for voting at not later than 6?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. LEA. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary is attempting to reduce to written form the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho. The Secretary will state the request.

The Secretary read as follows:

"It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that when the Senate takes a recess it shall be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow; that not later than 6 o'clock to-morrow the Senate will consent to vote upon the motion made by Mr. HEYBURN, that the Senate agree to the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections declaring that in the opinion of the said committee the charges preferred by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin were not sustained, and that the election of the said ISAAC STEPHENSON as a Senator of the United States was not procured by corrupt methods or practices, and upon any amendment that may then be pending or offered to such motion, and will continue such voting until the question is finally disposed of."

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest that the word "substitute" be inserted, as there is one of the amendments that is termed "a substitute."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be included in the word "amendment."

Mr. HEYBURN. Very well.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am in sympathy with the suggestion of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. I think we ought to go ahead now and debate this matter until it gets late, and then we can take a recess until an early hour to-morrow and get through. We have consumed enough time now in trying to fix some hour for voting to have had one of the proposed speeches made. I will have to object to the request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Kansas that the request for unanimous consent just preferred by the Senator from Idaho does not contemplate a recess at the present time, but only provides that when the Senate takes a recess it shall be until 11 o'clock to-morrow. There is no present suggestion of a recess.

Mr. BRISTOW. The purpose is, I know, to take a recess as quickly as possible after this agreement is entered into, and then we will drag along until late to-morrow afternoon, when we will be confronted with amendments and substitutes which we will have no opportunity to understand before they are voted upon.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no such intention. I contemplate that a considerable time will be used this afternoon in speaking.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be for the Senate to say whether it desires to take a recess now or later.

Mr. HEYBURN. I shall not move to take a recess now. I hope the Senate will continue in session, and I shall ask that it continue in session until late to-night, unless we reach an agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary has stated the request for unanimous consent preferred by the Senator from Idaho. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered accordingly. The question is——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I entered an objection to that request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not hear the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. I did object most emphatically, and the RECORD will show it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that he understood the Senator from Kansas to say that he did not object.

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, no.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then, of course, the request for unanimous consent is not agreed to. There is objection to the request.

Mr. ROOT and others. Regular order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to the motion offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair, the "noes" have it.

Mr. BACON and Mr. STONE. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question——

Mr. HEYBURN. Has the Chair announced the vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair stated the question to be upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] in the nature of a substitute for the motion proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. STONE. We should like to have the question stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, let that question be stated; but I understood that the Chair put the question on the adoption of the report of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the Chair put the question upon agreeing to the substitute proposition of the Senator from Washington, and the Senator from Idaho voted "no."

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood there was only one vote either way, and that was for the substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the result was being announced the question was raised as to what the motion was upon which the Senate was voting. The Secretary will again state the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Washington.

The SECRETARY. On February 19, 1912, Mr. HEYBURN moved that the report of the committee be adopted and that ISAAC STEPHENSON be declared entitled to a seat as a Senator from the State of Wisconsin in the United States Senate. On March 22, 1912, Mr. JONES offered the following as an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the motion made by Mr. HEYBURN, namely:

Resolved, That ISAAC STEPHENSON was not duly and legally elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, I do not desire any inconsistent record in connection with this matter. I understood the Chair to say: "If there is no further discussion, the question is upon the adoption of the motion of the Senator from Idaho," and upon that I voted. I did not vote upon anything else, and I do not care to have the RECORD——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho misunderstood the Chair. The Chair stated the question——

Mr. HEYBURN. Then the RECORD should be corrected as to the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course, the explanation of the Senator goes into the RECORD, and the RECORD stands corrected.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is true; but I am entitled to have it in uninterruptedly, because of the misunderstanding between the Chair and myself, and not to have it afterwards made the subject of controversy.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas moves that the Senate stand in recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. The question is on that motion. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair the "noes" have it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I transfer it to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BURNHAM (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). My colleague, the senior Senator from New Hampshire, is paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. I transfer it to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. I do not see him in his seat, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. PAGE's name was called). I have been requested to announce by the junior Senator from Vermont his absence from the city as a member of a committee of the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). The senior Senator from Michigan is out of the city on business of the Senate.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I desire to inquire whether the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not voted.

Mr. STONE. I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming, which has been transferred to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], and I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LEA (when Mr. TAYLOR's name was called). The senior Senator from Tennessee is detained from the Chamber by illness.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. CLARK] is absent on business of the Senate. He is generally paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] during his present absence. I forgot the fact and voted. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BURNHAM. I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], but having been released therefrom I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (after having voted in the affirmative). In view of my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] I withdraw my vote.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. THORNTON] is absent on business of the Senate.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 36—as follows:

YEAS—17.

Bourne	Johnston, Ala.	Pomerene	Stone
Bryan	Martine, N. J.	Rayner	Watson

So the Senate refused to take a recess.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to submit a proposition for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate takes a recess it shall be until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, and that to-morrow at 6 o'clock——

Mr. SMOOT. Not later than 6 o'clock.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not later than 6 o'clock the Senate shall commence to vote upon this resolution and all amendments and substitutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And finish before adjournment?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; and without further debate.

Mr. BACON. All amendments pending and that may be offered?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; the usual form.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Kansas allow the Secretary to report the request?

The SECRETARY. That when the Senate takes a recess to-day it shall be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, and that not later than 6 o'clock to-morrow the Senate shall commence voting upon the motion made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] that the Senate agree to the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections declaring that in the opinion of the said committee the charges preferred by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin against ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, were not sustained; and that the election of said ISAAC STEPHENSON as a Senator of the United States was not procured by corrupt methods or practices, and upon any amendment that may then be pending or offered to such motion, and shall continue such voting until the question is finally disposed of.

Mr. BRISTOW. As I understand the proposed agreement, it is that the Senate shall meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow and vote not later than 6. I objected to practically the same request some time since, but I have been advised that a Senator who expected to speak immediately after the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] had closed is ill and unable to go on this afternoon. Under those circumstances I will not offer any objection to the request for unanimous consent, understanding, of course, that we do not have to stay here until 6 o'clock to-morrow unless there is some one who wants to take up the time; that we may vote at any time between 11 and 6 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask that the question be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I call for a reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Washington offers the following as a substitute for the motion made by the Senator from Idaho:

Resolved, That ISAAC STEPHENSON was not duly and legally elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I transfer it to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HEYBURN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HEYBURN. Senators are voting "yea" or "nay" on a call of the Senate for the purpose of determining whether or not a quorum is present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair the Senator is mistaken. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the question of agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to the motion of the Senator from Idaho. Those in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will vote "yea" and those opposed "nay." The Secretary will proceed with the roll call.

Mr. HEYBURN. Was there not a suggestion of a lack of a quorum?

Mr. LODGE. It came too late.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It came too late.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not hear the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. CULBERSON. I rise to a question of order. Debate is not in order while the roll is being called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained. The Secretary will proceed with the roll call.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. BURNHAM (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). My colleague, the senior Senator from New Hampshire, is paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. If my colleague were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. I transfer it to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. I do not see him in his seat and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). The senior Senator from Michigan, who is absent from the city on official business, is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. I am not authorized to say how he would vote, nor do I know how any absent Senator would vote. I will not transfer the pair, but under the circumstances will withhold my vote.

Mr. LEA (when Mr. TAYLOR'S name was called). The senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] is quite ill at his apartments and, as I understand from a telephone message to-day, no one is able to communicate with him. I am therefore unable to state how he would vote on this question.

Mr. FOSTER (when Mr. THORNTON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. THORNTON] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. PERCY (when the name of Mr. WILLIAMS was called). My colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber by sickness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. If my colleague were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. CLARK] is absent on the business of the Senate and has a pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. JONES] is absent on public business.

Mr. BRADLEY. I am paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR]. I have received a message over the phone from his secretary releasing me from that pair, but in order to prevent any question, I transfer the pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. REED. I regard myself as paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer the pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BACON. I am paired on this question and also generally with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. For that reason I shall not vote. I am informed that if the Senator from Minnesota were present he would vote "nay," and I should vote to the contrary.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], who is confined to his house by illness, phoned me a short time ago that he would be unable to come here. He is paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

Mr. CULBERSON (after having voted in the affirmative). In view of the statement made by the Senator from Wyoming, a statement which I myself had intended to make, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to ask whether or not the record shows that I am at liberty to vote. I understand the Senator from Oregon made a transfer during my temporary absence from the Chamber.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will state that I did that. I thought the Senator would not be here.

Mr. OWEN. That is entirely agreeable to me. If I were at liberty to vote, I wish to say I would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and that the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—27.

Borah	Crawford	Kenyon	Reed
Bourne	Cummins	Kern	Simmons
Bristow	Gardner	Lea	Smith, Ga.
Brown	Gore	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.

So the resolution of Mr. JONES was rejected.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m., Tuesday) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 27, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 26, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, open Thou our spiritual eyes that we may discern beneath the rough exterior in every human heart the image of his Maker; that a profounder love, a broader charity may prevail, and the ties of fraternity have a broader scope, a deeper significance. That the genius of the Christian religion may find its full fruition in every heart and Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AVIATION IN WARFARE.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I present the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 448.

Resolved, That the great importance and necessity of a practical knowledge of aviation as it relates to warfare being now generally admitted by all civilized nations, some of which are spending large sums of money in equipping their armies with various kinds of air craft as a means both of attack and of transport, the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to send to the House of Representatives full information upon the following points:

First. The results of his investigations and the transmission of any reports made by our official agents in foreign countries as to the development and value of aerial navigation, either for the purpose of warfare or to encourage scientific research.

Second. The extent and cost of our Government's equipment in aeroplanes or other air craft now being used in any capacity by the War Department, and the nature of the instruction in aeronautics which is being given to its Army officers and enlisted men.

Third. The plans now contemplated by the War Department for increasing the present equipment of aeroplanes, hydro-aeroplanes, and other air craft for the purposes of warfare and national defense, together with recommendations for such legislation as will adequately provide for such service with reference both to increasing the number of Army officers of the Signal Corps who may be detailed for aviation service as well as the establishment of additional schools of instruction and the building up of our air fleet commensurate with the necessity of properly maintaining our military status among the nations of the world.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report (No. 450).

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report to accompany House resolution 448:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the House resolution 448, having considered the same, reports thereon with a recommendation that it do pass with the following amendments:

Strike out on page 1, line 7, the words "respectfully requested," and insert the word "directed"; and in lines 7 and 8, page 1, strike out the words "if not incompatible with the public interests."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, as I could not catch the purpose of the resolution from the reading at the desk, I will ask the gentleman from Virginia to explain what it is.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution asking the War Department to furnish the House of Representatives information as to the present condition of the aviation service, and also asking that department to furnish any other information it may have, with a view to further building up the aviation service in the United States Army.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, amend by striking out the words "respectfully requested" and insert the word "directed."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Lines 7 and 8, page 1, strike out the words "if not incompatible with the public interests."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the amended resolution.

The question was taken, and the amended resolution was agreed to.

PENSIONS.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in regard to what does the gentleman desire to address the House?

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. In regard to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia on last Thursday, in the consideration of pensions, wherein he attacked the record of a soldier of the State of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, to what gentleman from Georgia does the gentleman from Pennsylvania refer?

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. To Mr. TRIBBLE.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I do not see Mr. TRIBBLE upon the floor at this time, and unless he is present I shall object, and I do object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects.

CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARY HANSARD.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk for present consideration the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing the Librarian of Congress to furnish a copy of the daily and bound CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to the undersecretary of state for external affairs of Canada in exchange for a copy of the Parliamentary Hansard.

Resolved, etc., That the Librarian of Congress is hereby authorized to furnish a copy of the daily and bound CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to the undersecretary of state for external affairs of Canada in exchange for a copy of the Parliamentary Hansard, and that the Public Printer is hereby directed to honor the requisition of the Librarian of Congress for such copy. The Parliamentary Hansard so received shall be the property of the Department of State.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Clerk to read the Senate resolution to which the resolution he has just read is an amendment proposed by the Committee on Printing, and also the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this is not a privileged resolution.

Mr. FINLEY. I understand that, Mr. Speaker. I have not called this up as a privileged resolution, but I did call it up some time ago and there was no objection to it. I ask unanimous consent to consider the resolution at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FINLEY. I now ask that the Senate resolution be read (S. Con. Res. 14).

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate resolution and the report of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of State is hereby authorized to furnish a copy of the daily and bound CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to the undersecretary of state of external affairs of Canada in exchange for a copy of the Parliamentary Hansard, and that the Public Printer is hereby directed to honor the requisition of the Secretary of State for such copy.

Mr. FINLEY, from the Committee on Printing, makes the following report (H. Rept. 454, to accompany S. Con. Res. 14):

The Committee on Printing having had under consideration the Senate concurrent resolution 14, authorizing the Secretary of State to furnish a copy of the daily and bound CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to the undersecretary of state for external affairs of Canada in exchange for a copy of the Parliamentary Hansard and directing the Public Printer to honor the requisition of the Secretary of State for such copy, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to with the following amendments: First, on line 1, strike out all after the words "Resolved by the Senate" and insert the following, "and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Librarian of Congress is hereby authorized to furnish a copy of the daily and bound CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to the undersecretary of state for external affairs of Canada in exchange for a copy of the Parliamentary Hansard, and that the Public Printer is hereby directed to honor the requisition of the Librarian of Congress for such copy. The Parliamentary Hansard so received shall be the property of the Department of State." Second, amend the title to read as follows: "Joint resolution authorizing the Librarian of Congress to furnish a copy of the daily and bound CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to the undersecretary of state for external affairs of Canada in exchange for a copy of the Parliamentary Hansard."

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the committee requires that the Librarian of Congress furnish this publication. The reason for that is that it is usual for an exchange of documents between this Government and foreign Governments to be made in that way. I ask for a vote on the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments to the Senate joint resolution.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the Senate concurrent resolution as amended.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution authorizing the Librarian of Congress to furnish a copy of the daily and bound CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to the undersecretary of state for external affairs of Canada in exchange for a copy of the Parliamentary Hansard."

PRINTING PROCEEDINGS OF THE UNVEILING OF THE STATUE OF BARON VON STEUBEN.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I send the following privileged resolution to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 39 (H. Rept. 448).

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the concurrent resolution passed August 21, 1911, providing for the printing of the proceedings upon the unveiling of the statue of Baron von Steuben in Washington, December 7, 1910, be amended by adding the following sentence after the last word thereof:

"There shall be included in the same volume, as herein provided for, the proceedings relating to the unveiling of the statue of Baron von Steuben in Berlin, September 2, 1911; and this document shall be compiled and printed under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing."

Mr. FINLEY. This is by way of an amendment to a resolution which passed some time ago.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question in connection with the resolution?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What is the practice in paying for the preparation of reports of these unveilings? I submit the question to the chairman of the committee, because there is now pending before the Committee on the Library a resolution to pay for the report of the proceedings ordered by the Senate when the monument to Gen. McClellan was unveiled. That has never been paid for, and I would like to know what has been the practice in order that we may have some assistance in considering that resolution.

Mr. FINLEY. I will state to the gentleman from Texas that, so far as I know, no arrangement for paying for preparation of reports like the one under consideration has been made, and so far as I am concerned none will be. I say to the gentleman that the reports are furnished to the Joint Committee on Printing and the publication is made under their direction.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Who furnishes the report to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. FINLEY. Well, take the resolution under consideration. The Member of the House who has been most active and who had the matter in charge, Dr. BARTHOLDT, of Missouri——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Was it written by him?

Mr. FINLEY. Oh, no; it is a copy of the proceedings of what took place at Berlin, and is to be a part of the publication relative to the unveiling of the statue in Washington.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman does not quite catch the purport of my question. It is this: A special report of the proceedings at the unveiling of the McClellan Monument was ordered and not paid for, as I understand. Previous reports of a similar nature had been ordered and paid for, but in this case it was not, and I would like to know if the practice is usually to have a special report of a historical nature made in connection with the unveiling of these monuments. Have there been historical sketches of Von Steuben and these other people?

Mr. FINLEY. My understanding is that the report in the case usually is a verbatim report of the proceedings and exercises and nothing more, and, so far as I know, there is no arrangement for payment to get up that report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] have leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD on this subject.

Mr. FINLEY. I did not see the gentleman from Missouri or I would have yielded the floor to him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD on this resolution. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The question was taken, and the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

PUBLIC HEALTH BULLETIN NO. 51.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 43.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives, to be distributed through the folding room, 100,000 copies of Public Health Bulletin No. 51, being a report on the cause and prevention of typhoid fever, with special reference to conditions observed in Yakima County, in the State of Washington, by L. L. Lumsden.

The report (No. 449) is as follows:

The Committee on Printing having had under consideration the House concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 43) providing for the printing of Public Health Bulletin No. 51, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to. The estimated cost will be $6,569.13.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

RAILROAD RATES FOR CARRYING MAIL.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 331.

Resolved, That 2,000 copies of House Document No. 105, entitled "Railroad Rates for Carrying Mails," be printed for the use of the Post Office Department.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report be read.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman ask unanimous consent?

Mr. FINLEY. I think the gentleman will find his objection obviated by hearing the report read.

Mr. MANN. I do not object, but it is not a privileged resolution, and the gentleman will have to ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report No. 452, to accompany House resolution 331.

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 331) providing for the printing of 2,000 copies of House Document 105, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to with the following amendment: On line 3 strike out the words "for the use of the Post Office Department" and in their place insert "for the use of the Committee on Post Office and Post Roads, House of Representatives." The estimated cost will be $465.90.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The question was taken, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

PRINTING OF HEARINGS NO. 54 (H. DOC. NO. 651).

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 42 (H. Rept. 453).

Resolved, etc., That there shall be printed 3,000 copies of hearings No. 54, before the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, House of Representatives, on H. Res. 109, to investigate the Post Office Department, for the use of the said committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, what is the hearing?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, this is a document relating to the Rural Delivery Service in the Post Office Department.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will state to the gentleman that it relates to hearings before the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department concerning the Rural Delivery Service.

Mr. FINLEY. This is from the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department.

Mr. AUSTIN. This refers to hearings on the Rural Free Delivery Service?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. The resolution ought to pass.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 1, after the word "resolved," the words "by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring)," be stricken out and that the title of the resolution be changed so as to read "House resolution." That, on line 6, the words "for the use of said committee" be stricken out and the following be inserted in their place: "Of which one thousand shall be for the use of said committee and two thousand for the use of the House of Representatives, to be distributed through the document room."

The resolution as amended is as follows:

House resolution 462.

Resolved, etc., That there shall be printed 3,000 copies of hearings No. 54, before the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, House of Representatives, on House resolution 109, to investigate the Post Office Department, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the said committee and 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, to be distributed through the document room.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will state to the gentleman that the committee has already requests for more than 1,000 copies, and that will not be sufficient to supply the requests of those who have already applied for them. I would like very much to have that changed so that at least 1,000 will go to the use of the committee.

Mr. FINLEY. I think the gentleman will agree with me that his committee will have no trouble to get at least a large part of the documents that will be consigned to the House document room. As the gentleman must know, if we give all of a publication like this, which is of general importance and excites considerable interest, to the members of the committee, we will then be cutting out all the other Members of the House. To give each one a few copies, or place them in the document room so that they can be obtained, I think, will obviate that. The committee thought that was an objection to the resolution. I will say to the gentleman frankly that I think there will be no trouble on that score.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the House concurrent resolution as amended.

The House concurrent resolution was agreed to.

The title was amended so as to read: "House resolution."

ACUTE ANTERIOR POLIOMYELITIS.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for consideration of the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 434.

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives 5,000 copies of Public Health Bulletin No. 44, as issued for February, 1911, by the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the United States, entitled "Acute Anterior Poliomyelitis," and all to be delivered to the superintendent of the document room of the House of Representatives for distribution.

The report (No. 447) is as follows:

Mr. FINLEY, from the Committee on Printing, makes the following report to accompany House resolution 434:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 434) providing for the printing of 5,000 copies of Public Health Bulletin No. 44, as issued for February, 1911, by the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the United States, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to. The estimated cost will be $116.35.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

PARCEL POST.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD two letters on the subject of parcel post.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER] asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD two letters on the subject of the parcel post. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to are as follows:

SANDWICH, ILL., March 12, 1912.

CONGRESSMAN FULLER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR:

I send by mail my doleful wail to him who never did us fail;
To us so dear—who has no fear—the man who hails from Belvidere.
Now this is sent with good intent for farmers whom you represent,
Who say you can vote for a plan to help them as their "hired man."
Some men will lead in human greed, yet they are men the farmers feed;
Some, rich by birth, want all the earth—may not be men of real worth;
You may be sure some others, fewer, would roast your carcass on a skewer,
If you were fair; or anywhere but said you dealt "upon the square."
The farmers guess the "Trust Express" is nothing less a throttling mess.
They say the lust of "Express Trust" for aye be cussed, and should be "bust."
They all will tell they pay like—well, express on what the merchants sell.
They took a stand and lent a hand defending home when war was fanned;
Now, in their fight, think you'd delight to aid them in a cause that's right.
But to be brief, they in their grief, demand that now they have relief.
Without a sham, with no flimflam, they put their trust in Uncle Sam;
And say that he from want is free, and if he helps they'll happy be.
It is their boast, they want, at most, relief by way of parcel post.
From hill and dale it is their wail, they want their parcels sent by mail.
I trust that you these thoughts imbue, and that you vote to help it through;
And here will say, to close this lay, I for success "will ever pray," etc.

Very sincerely, your friend,

J. IVOR MONTGOMERY.

SANDWICH, ILL., March 20, 1912.

At a farmers' meeting held here to-day,
One hundred and twenty men had their "say";
And as honest men, and as toilers, too,
They spake plain words, as such men do.
Now, these men of toil and these men of sweat,
Asked me if I'd "heard from FULLER yet?"
And I told them, "No; but I knew he would Reply as soon as ever he could;
For as farmer, teacher, or with saw and wrench,
Or as pleader at the bar, or as judge on the bench,
That whatever his calling since his life began,
He was always the friend of the toiler man;
There were none so poor, none so forlorn,
That CHARLES E. FULLER would pass with scorn."
Then these men of brawn and these men of toil,
All these hardy tillers of the soil,
Suggested that I should take my pen
And write you a letter for them again.
They say that men of means, a mighty throng,
Who have time to write petitions long,
And whose wealth is mines, and bonds, and bills,
And notes, and gold in their money tills,
Are now flooding Congress to their utmost
With letters opposed to a parcel post.
Now, the farmers, having no time to write you there,
Or to draft petitions or send their prayer,
Will depend upon you to demand their right
To a parcel post, and will win the fight.
Men who till the soil, and who sow the seed,
And whose duty it is mankind to feed,
You are bound to protect, and I know you'll try,
For unless they labor mankind must die.
Some are seeming to act only on the plan
That the dollar weighs more than the rights of man;
But if that is the lesson we ought to instill,
Why not tear down the shaft upon old Bunker Hill?
For the place should be planted to Indian corn
If the dollar weighs more than patriots born.
Some a dollar will pinch until every inch of the eagle screams with pain,
And will dream the most of that same bird's ghost on paying it out again;
There are some who give that the poor may live, and to lessen all their fears,
And believe, the while, that another's smile is better, by far, than tears.
There are some so great in their estimate of nature from pole to pole,
They can put a hand in the water, and withdraw it and see the hole;
Set it down all such never count as much as the one who wields a spade,
For no greater than an honest man has creation ever made.
All the sacred claim both to thought and aim, or to action, that thou wilt
That belongs to thee, thou should'st grant to me; for on this all rights are built.
On a time you felt discouraged; you appealed to farmer-friend,
And he volunteered to aid you, and contributes to that end;
He has helped you climb Fame's ladder 'till you see far better times,
Don't you throw him; for ingratitude is among the basest crimes.
You may calculate from childhood to the time when you are old,
Yet the value of true friendship you can't reckon up with gold;
It is merit makes the man who will be faithful to the end,
While the conscienceless dissembler will throw down his dearest friend.
If you rob a friend that's honest and then leave him to his fate,
If you pauperize his children, and his friendship turns to hate,
If you use him but to down him, he may turn on you at last,
And wreak vengeance to your sorrow for the wrongs of all the past.
If you have a grain of reason, then, it should control your head,
And before you murder friendship you would better, far, be dead;
Just remember, since creation it has always been the same,
That the most you'll leave behind you is the memory of a name.

Very sincerely, your friend,

J. IVOR MONTGOMERY.

To Hon. CHARLES E. FULLER,
Washington, D. C.

WESTERN NEWSPAPER UNION.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House resolution 458, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 458.

To authorize the investigation of the Western Newspaper Union.

The SPEAKER. The proper way to get this resolution before the House is to put it on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

Mr. MANN. The resolution is before the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed it had been reported. The resolution will be held in abeyance until the Committee on Rules reports it.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE (H. DOC. NO. 643).

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, which was read.

[For message, see the Senate proceedings of March 28.]

[The reading of the message was greeted with applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I rejoice greatly that the other side of the House applauds a message in favor of a reduction of a tariff schedule which they passed themselves. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to know if the gentleman will unite with this side of the House in continuing the Tariff Board and enabling them to do further work? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted if the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] did not repudiate his own board as he did with the bill he filed on the wool schedule a few days ago making some of the items even higher than they were in the old schedule. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and accompanying papers be referred to the Ways and Means Committee and that so much of the accompanying papers as the board itself indicates shall be printed, and so much as they indicate they do not desire to have printed be referred to the custody of the clerk of the committee. I wish to say if that resolution goes through I will ask unanimous consent to have 5,000 copies printed.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. MANN. Does the board indicate what portion it desires to have printed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not gone over it thoroughly, but I notice in the papers they have written on some parts that "This portion shall be printed," and that some shall not be printed, and so I suppose they have done that all the way through, although I have not carefully examined it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that the message and the accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, the message printed, and such parts of the accompanying papers as the Tariff Board has indicated shall be printed and the rest remain in the custody of the clerk of the committee. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I think on some of the papers sent in that the board has marked "Not to be printed."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be better to provide that should not be printed and that the other should be printed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On examination of the papers I see that they have indicated what should be printed and what should not, and I think my suggestion covers exactly what the gentleman refers to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in the printing of these documents there may be 5,000 printed, 1,000 for the use of the committee and 4,000 for the use of the House, to be distributed through the folding room.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to print 5,000 copies, 1,000 for the use of the Committee on Ways and Means and the other 4,000 to go to the folding room for the benefit of the Members.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that number will be sufficient?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think so. I have had very little demand for the wool report. I have got a surplus on hand, and I think that 5,000 copies of this will be more than enough. It will give each Member about 10 copies.

Mr. MANN. I think, as a matter of fact, that the 12,000 we have ordered printed of the wool report, which are now coming in, will not be sufficient to supply the demand for them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that we might try 5,000 of these and see how far they will go.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to.

RULES CONCERNING PENSION BILLS.

Mr. RODDENBERY rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] rise?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a resolution privileged under the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution by Mr. RODDENBERY.

Resolved, That the rules of the House be amended as follows:

(1) No omnibus private pension bill shall be considered by the House until the full report of the committee thereon shall have once been printed in the RECORD 10 days previous to calling such bill up for consideration.

(2) All general debate on any omnibus private pension bill shall be limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by proponents of the bill and one-half by the opponents of the bill.

(3) No omnibus private pension bill shall be placed on its passage under suspension of the rules——

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution is not a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Is it not possible to let the entire resolution be read before the point is ruled upon?

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken when it is ascertained clearly that the resolution is not privileged.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I send the resolution to the Clerk's desk, to be inserted in the basket.

Mr. FOSTER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a perfect right to put it in the basket.

Mr. FOSTER. But not to speak to the House in regard to it.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. HARDWICK, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. PUJO, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. MCHENRY, for 10 days, on account of illness.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 19212) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913; and, pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and one hour to be controlled by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider House bill No. 19212, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; and, pending that, he asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by himself and one hour by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the diplomatic and consular bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19212, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, with Mr. SIMS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 19212, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19212) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation bill needs little explanation. It is framed along fair and economical lines. The people of this country take a deep and an abiding interest in the Diplomatic and Consular Service. There is no other branch of the Government that is doing so much effective work for our trade and commerce and getting such good results for all the people as the Diplomatic and Consular Service. This applies not only to those citizens who travel and sojourn abroad, but it applies in a larger sense to the business people of America and to all the citizens of our country. It is a matter of gratification for me to say—and I know I voice the sentiments of our people generally—that there never was a time in the history of our country when our Diplomatic and Consular Service was so efficient and on so high a plane as it is to-day. [Applause.]

The value of the foreign service to the Government, to American commerce, and to the individual citizen is now recognized and can not be gainsaid. It is no longer merely political, but it has become to a large extent an efficient nonpartisan instrument for the expansion of American commerce and the extension of American enterprise, securing for American commercial interests fair and equal trade opportunity with the peoples of other countries, and it assures to the individual citizen the protection of his rights the world over. It is through its agency that the entire business of the Government in its relations with other Governments is conducted; and for every dollar expended for the foreign service the people of the United States receive directly or indirectly 100 for 1 in return.

Let me say much credit for this is due to the present administration and also to the preceding administration, and I am broad-minded enough to declare that, so far as I am concerned, in the future as in the past I shall do everything in my power to continue to improve the personnel and the efficiency of our foreign service and in so far as may be possible lift it completely out of the slough of partisan politics and put it where it belongs, upon the high, impregnable ground of the merit system, where talent, ability, competency, and experience shall be the sole qualifications for appointment and promotion. [Applause.]

This bill has been carefully prepared and considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and is reported to the House unanimously. The total estimates submitted aggregate $4,079,697.41; the amount appropriated for the last fiscal year was $3,987,766.41; the accompanying bill, carrying the appropriations for the next fiscal year, totals $3,427,491.41, which is a reduction of $560,275 from last year's appropriations and is $652,206 below the estimates submitted for the ensuing year. This saving to the taxpayers of our country speaks for itself and needs no further comment.

The various amounts appropriated for the Diplomatic and Consular Service in this bill are deemed to be quite sufficient to meet all the actual needs of the service for the next fiscal year. Every effort has been made to consistently economize where economy could wisely be practiced. No attempt was made to cripple in any way the administration of the State Department or to impair in the least degree the efficiency and the splendid work now being done by our foreign service. Not a salary was reduced, and only one increase was made, and that so small as to be quite immaterial.

The pruning of the estimates submitted for various purposes was conscientiously done where it could be afforded the most easily without present or future injury to any agency of the Government provided for in this appropriation bill. I repeat, there has not been a decrease in salary, and there has been no increase of salary save in one instance, namely, the pay of the secretary to the Turkish embassy, and his salary was placed on an equality with the salary of the secretary of the embassy to Japan and the salary of the secretary of the embassy to China.

The emergency fund—and that has been a matter of investigation and criticism in this House by another committee—after careful inquiry and mature deliberation has been reduced from $90,000 to $50,000, with the following limitation:

Provided, however, That the vouchers for the money expended under this appropriation shall be itemized, and the same shall be subject, whenever required, to the inspection of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate, or either of them.

Let me say there is no legitimate objection to this reduction, and there should be no opposition to the limitation which the committee put upon that appropriation. We believe this wise limitation will go far to silence adverse criticism and to a large extent satisfy the demand for greater publicity in the future regarding the disbursement of this emergency fund.

This appropriation bill, take it all in all, is about as fair and as just and as economical a measure as can be framed and brought into this House, and I for one of the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, responsible for its provisions, indulge the hope that it will pass the House without material change.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, and request the gentleman from Wisconsin to now use some of his time.

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

ROOSEVELT PRAISES TAFT.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit, for insertion in the RECORD, an interesting extract from a speech delivered by Col. Theodore Roosevelt as temporary chairman of the New York Republican State convention at Saratoga, N. Y., September 27, 1910. In the course of his remarks the colonel said:

We come here feeling that we have the right to appeal to the people from the standpoint alike of National and State achievement. During the last 18 months a long list of laws, embodying legislation most heartily to be commended as combining wisdom with progress, have been enacted by Congress and approved by President Taft.

The amendments to the interstate-commerce law; beginning of a national legislative program for the exercise of the taxing power in connection with big corporations doing an interstate business; the appointment of a commission to frame measures that do away with the evils of overcapitalization and of improper and excessive issues of stocks and bonds; the law providing for publicity of campaign expenses; the establishment of the maximum and minimum tariff provisions and the exceedingly able negotiation of the Canadian and other treaties in accordance therewith; the inauguration of the policy of providing for a disinterested revision of tariff schedules through a high-class commission of experts which will treat each schedule purely on its own merits, with a view both to protecting the consumer from excessive prices and to securing the American producer, and especially the American wage worker, what will represent the difference of cost in production here as compared with the cost of production in countries where labor is less liberally rewarded; the extension of the laws regulating safety appliances for the protection of labor; the creation of a Bureau of Mines—these, and similar laws, backed up by Executive action, reflect high credit upon all who succeeded in putting them in their present shape upon the statute books; they represent an earnest of the achievement which is yet to come and the beneficence and far-reaching importance of this work done for the whole people measure the credit which is rightly due to the Congress and to our able, upright, and distinguished President, William Howard Taft.

[Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH].

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, Monday of last week was set apart by the farmers of Michigan, and possibly throughout the country, to write their Members of Congress upon the subject of parcel post. I have received many letters bearing upon this subject, asking, urging, and even demanding, that I vote for a general parcel post.

These letters in the main were from farmers, and I think I state the situation correctly when I say that the farmers and some people living in the villages and cities favor a parcel post, while, on the other hand, the village and city merchants are opposed to it, believing that it will ruin their business, insisting that even a local rural parcel post is merely an entering wedge for a general parcel post, and for that reason must be regarded as the initial step toward all the evil consequences of a general parcel post and subject to all the objections of such a system, as they see it.

I am sure that no one knowingly wants to be a party to ruining the legitimate business of any person.

My experience is that the average Member of Congress wants to know the wishes of his constituents and carry them out as best he can, but the life of a Congressman is a busy one, and it often happens that he has not had the time nor the opportunity to give a subject the study and investigation he would like to, and this is especially so where there is such an honest difference of opinion as there is upon the subject of parcel post.

One Member becomes absorbed in the tariff, another in postal savings banks, another in parcel post, and so on, and we come to look upon them as authority upon these subjects as we rely upon the reports of committees respecting the various bills that are reported to the House.

I have often said that I wished we might have more than one secretary, for I believe that I could so utilize their time that it would be of lasting benefit not only to my constituents but to the country at large. I recall that before I made my first speech upon the reduction of telegraph rates (which with the combined efforts of others has resulted in the night letter and day letter, saving so many thousands of dollars daily to our people, and I may add that it is surprising to know how many people who are engaged in active business do not yet know of the existence of either the night or day letter), that I spent many months in the preparation of the same, well knowing that any mistake in figures or otherwise would be severely criticized by at least the two leading telegraph companies of the country, and after the time thus spent in preparation one of my greatest difficulties was to condense and cut down the speech so that it would be read by the average person and at the same time give the desired information.

I assume that some Member or Members of this honorable body have taken a very deep interest in the subject of parcel post and, as a result, have been enabled to give much time and consideration to the same. I think I can justly refer to the distinguished Member, Mr. SULZER, of New York, as having done so, and who I believe is regarded as an authority upon this subject.

EXPRESS RATES.

I want to say that however much Members may differ upon this subject, I believe I voice the sentiments of this body when I say we are willing to do whatever we can to reduce the exorbitant express rates which prevail in this country. In fact, as soon as reliable information and data can be secured from the Interstate Commerce Commission I intend to make a carefully prepared speech upon express rates.

I am about to read into the RECORD from the Hardware Reporter of December, 1911, a short article entitled "Enormous cost of parcel-post equipment," and want it expressly understood that I am in no way responsible for, nor am I bound by, any statement or figures contained therein.

The annual Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 21279), "A bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," has been reported to the House, and doubtless will be considered within the next two or three weeks, and, in my judgment, contains all the parcel-post legislation that will be reported from that committee during this session of Congress.

Taking the article referred to as a text or guide, I would be very glad, and I believe I express the wishes of many of my associates on both sides of the Chamber, if the distinguished gentleman from New York referred to, Mr. SULZER, or some one else would in the meantime, or when this bill is under discussion, speak at some length as to the cost of a general parcel post and secure enough time so that Members may have an opportunity to ask questions and have a full, fair, and frank discussion of the same. I am sure that it can but result in doing much good, because those who favor and those who oppose a general parcel post or a parcel post in any form ought to be willing, and I am sure are, to invite and encourage the fullest discussion of the same.

"ENORMOUS COST OF PARCEL-POST EQUIPMENT.

"The cost—what will it cost to put into operation this proposed scheme for parcel post?

"There are in this country more than 1,900 Federal buildings occupied in whole or in part by post offices. The outlay for these buildings is more than $160,000,000.

"A parcel post will require an increase in space of at least one-half for all these buildings; or, in other words, an outlay approximating $100,000,000.

"There are about 50,000 fourth-class postmasters in this country. These postmasters will be required to give more space to the handling of parcels. It will require more of their time, and their pay will therefore have to be increased on an average of $100 each, which will require another outlay of at least $5,000,000.

"There are more than 40,000 rural routes already in operation. It will mean a direct outlay and additional equipment of another horse and strong wagon; of at least $150 a year for each rural carrier, or another outlay approximating $8,000,000.

"Warehouses at railroad terminals will be required at an outlay approximating $10,000,000.

"In Germany last year 343,000,000 parcels were carried at an average of 9 pounds each. To carry these parcels at 10 cents a pound means a direct loss in carrying of at least 18 cents a package, and, with the enormous retail mail-order business in this country, there will be not less than 500,000,000 packages carried the first year. This will bring a loss to the Government approximating $90,000,000; or, in other words, a direct outlay and loss the first year in the installation and operation of parcel post approximating anywhere from $225,000,000 to $250,000,000.

"Certainly an outlay of such proportions for a parcel post, which creates nothing and benefits nobody but the retail mail-order house, is objectionable. It is not justified by the application of any of the simplest business principles." [Applause.]

I can not conclude these brief remarks without inserting an article from the Daily Consular and Trade Reports of February 16, 1912, entitled:

FARM PRODUCE BY PARCEL POST.

[From Consul Edwin N. Gunsaulus, Johannesburg, South Africa.]

"A recent issue of South Africa details as follows the advantages derived by both the producer and consumer of farm products by the extension throughout the Union of South Africa of the agricultural parcel post:

"'Among the benefits which were conferred on the agricultural community by the post-office act which recently came into operation was the extension of what is known as the agricultural parcel post throughout the Union. The system has been in force in the Transvaal for some time and has yielded a great deal of benefit to various classes, and its extension to the Union is, of course, a decided march forward, bringing in its train increased facilities to the people of the Transvaal, who will be enabled to send parcels by this means to any of the Provinces, and offering facilities which have hitherto not been enjoyed by the Cape, Free State, or Natal.

"'The agricultural parcel post is very comprehensive in its range, and practically means the conveyance at low rates of anything produced or manufactured within the confines of the Union. The official description is "parcels containing articles produced, or, if manufactured, produced and manufactured in the Union of South Africa, addressed to any place within the same (except Rhodes Drift, Pietersburg, which receives its correspondence from Tuli, in Rhodesia)." Among the articles which may thus be sent are butter, eggs, poultry, bread, biscuits, yeast, tea, dried meats, jam, honey, tobacco, cigarettes, dried and bottled fruits, confectionery, plants, seeds, and so on. Of course, the success of an institution of this kind depends very much on the scale of charges.

"'Many people, no doubt, would like to get their butter, meat, and poultry direct from the producer. For example, in Cape Town one of the great drawbacks to direct dealing with the farmer has been the cost and trouble of getting produce conveyed from him, but under the agricultural parcel post, at any rate, there should not be any difficulty on that score, for a parcel up to 11 pounds in weight will be carried to any part of the Union for 24 cents. The scale of postage is as follows: Up to 1¼ pounds, 6 cents; over 1¼ pounds and not more than 3 pounds, 12 cents; up to 6 pounds, 16 cents; up to 9 pounds, 20 cents; up to 11 pounds, 24 cents.

"'In order to prevent fraud, the authorities require that a declaration shall be signed by the senders. Returned empties may also be sent by this system. The original declaration label must be attached, indorsed "Returned empty," and the empty parcels must be addressed to the person who signed the declaration. The experiment is one that should do much to bring the producer and consumer in closer touch, and its operation will be watched with the greatest interest.'"

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I have no more demands for time on this side.

Mr. SULZER. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREGG].

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the iniquity of giving to Members of the House the privilege of extending their remarks in the RECORD is fully exemplified in the remarks that were extended by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE], which appear on page 3929 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. On last Thursday I sat here patiently all the afternoon listening to the reading of the bill relating to invalid pensions and also listening to the arguments that were being made for and against that bill. Not one single word was publicly uttered in this House in relation to any one of my constituents; but when I turn to page 3929 and the top of page 3930, I discover that reference has been made to one John Walter, whose name is misprinted in the RECORD as John Walters. It is there stated:

For instance, on page 65 of the report, John Walters owns a home valued at $2,500 and has assistance from a lodge, and he is recommended for an increase to $30 a month.

The report states that fact; but I rise here to attempt, in my feeble way, to correct a portion of that statement. The fact of the matter is that John Walter lives in a little home in Scottdale, in the county in which I reside, and I desire now to read from a telegram which I received this morning from one of the most reputable attorneys at the bar in our county in answer to a message that I sent to him requesting him to give me the facts in regard to John Walter.

I might say that I know John Walter personally, and I know how feeble he is. The following is the telegram:

GREENSBURG, PA., March 25, 1912.

Hon. CURTIS H. GREGG,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

John Walter pays $56 taxes this year; property cost him fifteen hundred 20 years ago; wife's whole inheritance of eight hundred is in it. He was in active service 2 years 11 months. Was with Sherman 1 year 2 months. After battle of Resaca was Sherman's private orderly. Sherman took him along to New York, Chicago, West Point, and Louisville. Wished Walter to stay with him on his staff; promised to make him second lieutenant and advance him. Walter's mother needed him and he came home. Sherman sent him one of his horses. Gave Walter keys to chests and said take money or anything he wanted. Walter took slouch hat worn by Sherman on march to sea. Sherman afterwards sent Walter check for $75. Walter has letters from General and Mrs. Sherman. At battle of Resaca, Walter in saddle almost continuously four days and three nights. Wore out three horses. Carried dispatches to left wing over ground swept by cross-fire. From history of Fifteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, page 590, I copy:

"John Walter, of Company K, was another. At the battle of Resaca he so distinguished himself in carrying dispatches on our 14-mile line of battle as to merit the commendation of Gen. Sherman, who personally asked him to be his private orderly, and was retained in that position till July, 1865, when he was discharged. It was Walter who took the verbal order from Gen. Sherman to Gen. Logan to take command of Gen. McPherson's corps after that general had been killed in battle. A staff officer generally does work of that kind, but just then time was an important object. It was a question of minutes, and Sherman took the best he had for his messenger."

I know Walter. The soul of honor, now as helpless as a creeping child.

C. E. HELLER.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind it ill becomes any person upon the floor of this House to attack the reputation of John Walter, or of any soldier of the North in the Civil War. John Walter, like thousands and thousands of others, when Sumter was fired upon, looked upon the flag and saw its sky-born glory blaze against the midnight gloom and caught the courage of its stars. [Applause.] In those days John Walter became a guardian of this Nation and the Nation was John Walter's ward. To-day John Walter is a ward, and he asks the Nation to become his guardian. [Applause.]

I desire to have printed in connection with my remarks the portion of the report of the committee found on the bottom of page 63 and the top of page 64.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be granted.

The portion of the report referred to is as follows:

H. R. 9611. John Walter, aged 72 years, was enrolled in Company I, One hundred and sixtieth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, August 21, 1862, and mustered out July 5, 1865, as of Company K, Fifteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, to which he was transferred from Company I, same regiment, to which designation changed from Company I, One hundred and sixtieth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

Is now a pensioner under the act of February 6, 1907, at $15 per month on account of age.

Was formerly pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, at $10 for chronic diarrhea, rheumatism, and disease of heart, and right inguinal hernia and senile debility.

Address, Scottdale, Pa.

Board of surgeons, May 11, 1904, found disease of heart, diarrhea, rheumatism, and right inguinal hernia.

Medical testimony is that applicant has endocarditis and arteriosclerosis; has interstitial nephritis, and at times has convulsions as a result; has right inguinal hernia, very hard to retain by a truss; that he is of a rheumatic diathesis, and the joints of both hands are enlarged and motion limited one-half; has rheumatism in legs, shoulders, and arms; frequently suffers from pulmonary edema; that he can not walk, dress, or undress without assistance; that he is emaciated and weak, and unfitted for manual labor.

Applicant, it is stated, owns a home worth $2,500; rents two rooms in his house, gets assistance from a local lodge, and draws a pension of $15 a month.

It is further shown that the income from the rented rooms will not exceed $3 per room per month when rented.

An increase to $30 a month is proper.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FINLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SULZER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

Mr. RODDENBERY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, in his remarks, out of his own language and out of the report that he puts in the RECORD, discloses that the gentleman from Georgia, to whom he made reference, uttered nothing on the floor and placed nothing in the RECORD that does not literally, word for word, agree with the printed report of the committee on the bill.

I do not rise, therefore, for the purpose of adverting to the incident in any way. In these five minutes, however, I want to congratulate the House and the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we have reached the point further in this pension legislation when not only Members want the time that the gag rule gives them, where they not only want the right to extend their remarks in the RECORD, but also want the right, by unanimous consent, to defend their private pension bills which they seek to pass here. Not only have we thus progressed, but they want more than that. When the consular and diplomatic bill is under consideration for general debate they seek to get time from Members who control it so that they may go still further and discuss these pension propositions.

Gentlemen are not so silent now as they were four weeks ago; gentlemen are not so content now as they were four weeks ago; and two weeks hence you will not be as content as you are now. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was one of the towering factors and one of the emphatic voices that gave his vote to suspend all rules and rush this legislation through last week. He joined with the majority in adopting a course that the czarism of the Cannon régime has never approximated.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I will not. The gentleman can get time to ask me a question when the next pension bill comes up, if he will stand by me and help get time for fair discussion. I will yield to him then. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, along with other Members, put upon us 20 minutes' debate on 250 pension bills, and it is no wonder now that they want unanimous consent to submit a few remarks on pensions.

I introduced this morning a resolution which I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will help me get passed so that he can defend his private pension bills, which resolution allows two hours of general debate on private pension bills and gives two hours' debate under the five-minute rule. Under that resolution nobody can filibuster; nobody can take up excessive time under that rule. If you are opposed to a fair investigation of these frauds on the Public Treasury made in behalf of deserters and in the name of the Union soldiers, then vote down my resolution for fair discussion and free debate. We will confront you later with opportunity to vote for freedom of debate and amendment. When you go back home after having obtained additional tribute for this soldier, who has $2,500 worth of real estate, now drawing $15 a month pension, and who is supported partly by his lodge, when you go back home explain to your other pensioners, who are destitute and have nothing, why you did not do something for them, if you can.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes, or so much as he may desire, to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in order to call to the attention of both sides of the House, especially the other side of the House, the great availability of a certain gentleman as a candidate for the Presidency, I desire to have read in my time a statement of a very eminent statesman and editor concerning one of the Democratic candidates. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an article which recently appeared in one of the Washington papers.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 14, 1912.]

NO DEMOCRAT, THIS—WILLIAM R. HEARST TAKES MEASURE OF "PROF." WILSON—LIKE A FISH OUT OF WATER—REALLY A FEDERALIST, HE FAILS UTTERLY IN DEMOCRATIC POSE—MORE SUGGESTIVE OF JUDAS THAN OF ST. PAUL, SAYS PUBLISHER, WHO SEES NO CHANCE FOR HIS ELECTION—AS PRESIDENT HE WOULD BE A POSITIVE DANGER TO COUNTRY AND PARTY—HAS NEVER TOLD WHAT HE BELIEVES.

"Two former presidential candidates, Mr. Gaynor, minority mayor of New York, and Prof. Wilson, occasional governor of New Jersey, have seen fit to accuse me of responsibility for their political demise," said William Randolph Hearst, who arrived in Washington yesterday.

"I am unworthy of such distinction, and to the posthumous correspondence of these gentlemen I would like to add the following plain statement of fact:

"I am not a candidate for the Presidency, as these gentlemen seem to fear.

"I am, however, committed to the Democratic cause, and I am anxious to see the Democratic Party nominate for the Presidency a genuine Democrat who can be elected.

"Of course in this connection no one seriously considers Mayor Gaynor for a moment.

"Prof. Wilson, on the other hand, has some claim to consideration, but he must and should properly be considered from the viewpoint of whether or not he is a genuine Democrat, and whether or not there is a reasonable chance of his election.

MR. HEARST DEFINES A DEMOCRAT.

"What is a genuine Democrat?

"He is a man who loves and trusts the people, follows reverently in the footsteps of the great leaders of the people, and continually and consistently advocates the basic principles of popular government.

"After reading Prof. Wilson's writings, listening to his speeches, and endeavoring to form an unprejudiced estimate of the man and his manner of thought, I am compelled to conclude that the distinguishing characteristics of Prof. Wilson are that he habitually distrusts the people, has continually deprecated such great popular leaders as Washington, Jefferson, and Jackson, and has spent nine-tenths of his life in denouncing the program and propaganda of popular government that he now pretends to support.

"In my honest judgment, therefore (which is the only thing that can guide my actions), Mr. Wilson is not a Democrat.

"He is not even a Republican. He is a Federalist.

"A Democrat, I say, is a man who sincerely believes in the essential justice and wisdom of popular government."

A REPUBLICAN DEFINED.

"A Republican is a man who believes in popular government, except where it interferes with his special privileges.

"But a Federalist is a man who distrusts the people and actually desires to limit and restrict the people's power in government.

"At present no Federalist Party exists in the United States, but Federalists exist.

"These Federalists may call themselves Democrats or may call themselves Republicans, but in sentiment and sympathy they are Federalists. They think as Federalists, and when not appealing to the people for political support they act and speak and write as Federalists.

"Alexander Hamilton was the leader of the Federalist movement, the founder of the Federalist idea, and an exaggerated and exalted estimate of Hamilton is the natural and inevitable characteristic of the Federalist disciple."

PROF. WILSON A FEDERALIST.

"Prof. Wilson, in his 'History of the American People,' says of Hamilton:

"'Hamilton was above all a statesman. He believed in a centralized government; that the State governments as independent bodies might be extinguished or, at any rate, subordinated; that the new Executive of the Nation might hold for life, and at least one of the National Legislatures for a like term or, at least, during good behavior.'

"Then, later, Prof Wilson writes:

"'What shall we do to return safely to Hamilton? We think of Hamilton rather than of Washington when we look back to the policy of the first administration.'

"Prof. Wilson first defines Hamilton's federalistic ideas, then expresses his own federalistic admiration of Hamilton and these policies.

"This was all written when Prof. Wilson was not a candidate for the Presidency and when he was freely and honestly expressing his actual federalistic opinions.

"It was under similar conditions, conducive to genuine expression of actual sentiment, that Prof. Wilson reflected upon Washington and said:

"'It is for anyone who likes the sinister suggestion to say that Washington's ardor for the occupancy of the western country was that of the land speculator, not that of the statesman.'

PROF. WILSON ON JEFFERSON AND JACKSON.

"It was under similar conditions that Prof. Wilson wrote of Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic Party:

"'Mr. Jefferson was an aristocrat, who deliberately practiced the arts of the politician and exhibited oftentimes the sort of insincerity which subtle natures yield to without loss of essential integrity.'

"And again:

"'Washington found Jefferson a guide who needed watching.'

"It was under similar conditions that Prof. Wilson wrote of Andrew Jackson:

"'The country is older now than it was when Andrew Jackson delighted in his power, and few can believe that it would again approve or applaud childish arrogance and ignorant arbitrariness like his.'

"It was under similar unconstrained conditions, before his natural line of thought was affected by his presidential ambitions, that Prof. Wilson referred to our immigrants from the south of Europe 'as men of the lowest classes and men of the meaner sort; men out of the ranks where there was neither skill nor energy nor any initiative of quick intelligence. They came in numbers, which increased from year to year as if the countries of the south of Europe were disburdening themselves of the more sordid and hapless elements of their population.'

"'The Chinese were more to be desired as workingmen, if not as citizens, than most of the coarse crew that came crowding in every year at the eastern ports.

"'The unlikely fellows who came in at our eastern ports were tolerated because they usurped no place but the very lowest in the scale of labor.'

NOT DEMOCRATIC UTTERANCES.

"Now, just and gentle reader, whether you approve of Prof. Wilson's admiration for Hamilton and Hamilton's federalistic policies, or whether you do not; whether you approve of Prof. Wilson's aspersions upon Washington, Jefferson, and Jackson, and other popular leaders, or whether you do not; whether you approve of Prof. Wilson's air of sniffy superiority and his apparent contempt for the plainer and poorer people and for their idols and ideals, or whether you do not; whether you approve of Prof. Wilson's attitude on all of these matters or not, you must admit that it is not a Democratic attitude, that these are not the utterances of a genuine Democrat.

"Let us do full justice to Prof. Wilson, however. Let us give him the benefit of every doubt.

"Perhaps Prof. Wilson wrote, and thought, and spoke, and taught as a Federalist for the 50 years before he became a candidate for the Presidency, and then actually and suddenly was transformed into a genuine Democrat six weeks after he became a candidate.

"Perhaps so; but can I honestly believe that he was so speedily transformed? Can you believe it?

"Suppose a man had spoken disparagingly of you for 50 years and then had decided to try to borrow some money from you, and had thereupon spoken pleasantly of you?

"Could you believe that he was really your friend, or would you shrewdly suspect that he was only trying to flatter you into doing him a favor?

"Would you think that you were quite safe in intrusting important matters deeply affecting your interests to his hands?

NOT AT ALL LIKE ST. PAUL.

"And if I were your personal adviser, as a conscientious publisher is a trusted adviser of the public, would I be doing my duty to you if I advised you to intrust too much to this changeable man until I felt sure that he had become really your friend and was not merely pretending to be?

"I have a high conception of my journalistic duties and responsibilities, and I adhere to that conception with devotion and without deviation.

"If I were convinced that Prof. Wilson were a genuine Democrat, capable of being elected to the Presidency and of conducting that great office in the interests of the people, I would unreservedly advise the people to support him.

"But being unconvinced of this, I will not advise the people to support him, let all the dogs from Spot to Cerebus howl as they will.

"There are enthusiastic supporters of Prof. Wilson that believe him to be a second Saul of Tarsus, who has seen a great light and been actually converted. I do not believe it.

"There are many definite differences between Prof. Wilson and St. Paul.

"The great light that St. Paul saw was not a light of personal preferment, was not a light of public office, was not a light of material advantage.

"St. Paul abandoned material consideration to follow his convictions; he did not merely change his convictions to secure honor and position.

"He sacrificed himself to benefit the people; he did not merely seek to use the people to advance himself.

"He left his home and his people and went out into the world to do good, and did not begin by asking a pension from Herod.

"Neither did he draw a salary from the government while neglecting the duties of office and devoting his time to his personal advancement.

MORE SUGGESTIVE OF JUDAS.

"The constant intrusion of certain pieces of silver into the career of our modern convert is more suggestive of a Judas than of a St. Paul.

"Finally, not only St. Paul's acts, but St. Paul's words rang true.

"St. Paul spoke clearly and fearlessly, whatever he thought, and every follower was able to understand exactly what he meant.

"But who can know or state with any definiteness what Prof. Wilson actually thinks of the leading questions of the day?

"At the Jackson day harmony dinner in Washington, in the midst of the utter silence Prof. Wilson insists upon before he begins his address, a sturdy Western Democrat at one of the tables said so all could hear:

"'Now, Professor, tell us what you think to-night.'

"It was not too much for a Democrat to ask of a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, but Prof. Wilson did not respond, either directly or in his speech.

"Prof. Wilson was not asked to state what he had thought of Jackson and Jefferson in times past. He was not asked to repeat his criticism of recent Democratic platform and recent Democratic candidates.

"He was not asked to explain his altered attitude on many progressive policies.

"He was only asked to state definitely what he thought that night.

"He did not explain definitely, and he never does explain definitely. He asks all Democrats to forget his past attitude, but is not willing to make them understand his present one.

GOV. WILSON'S IDEAS UNKNOWN.

"Prof. Wilson has made more speeches than all the other candidates for the Presidency in all the other parties combined, and still he has not yet been able definitely to state what he really believes.

"To those who ask for bread, Prof. Wilson distributes the polished pebbles of his oratory. They may be brilliant; they may be beautiful, but they are not bread; they are but stones.

"Prof. Wilson, who formerly ridiculed and reviled the initiative, referendum, the recall, and direct nominations, and educated his students to oppose these popular measures, now says that he believes in the initiative in a way, and in the referendum in part, and in the recall on certain occasions, and in direct nominations under certain conditions.

"He thinks that the tariff is an issue, but he has been unable clearly to formulate his tariff program.

"He concedes that the trust question is a leading one, but he has been unwilling clearly to explain how he purposes to deal with the trust question.

"Prof. Wilson modifies every statement, qualifies every utterance, and stands nicely balanced on every issue, ready to retreat or advance as occasion requires.

"If Prof. Wilson's inconsistencies and contradictions, his un-Democratic and un-American utterances, should not become sufficiently well known before the convention to prevent his nomination, they will certainly become well enough known during the campaign to prevent his election.

"And while defeat at the polls is not what the Democrat desires, that defeat would certainly be better for the party in the long run than the election of a man who is not in heart and action a Democrat.

DEMOCRATIC POSE ASSUMED.

"The whole trouble with Prof. Wilson is that he is not a Democrat, and does not know how to be a Democrat. His Democratic pose is assumed, and, therefore, awkward and unnatural.

"He is a fish out of water. In the pursuit of his ambitions he has left the federalistic element in which he knew how to swim and has come out upon the Democratic land upon which he does not know how to walk.

"As a candidate for President he would be a pitiful disappointment.

"As an actual President he would be a positive danger to his party and to the country. A Democratic President who is not a Democrat would be a failure, and the failure of an administration for which the Democratic Party could be held responsible would mean the expulsion of Democracy from power for another score of years.

"These are my reasons for not supporting Prof. Wilson. They may or may not be sound. At least they are not selfish.

"I have a fairly accurate faculty for detecting frauds, as Mayor Schmitz and Mayor Gaynor, as Senator BAILEY and Senator Foraker, as District Attorney Jerome and Gov. Dix can testify.

"I unhesitatingly classify Prof. Wilson in the same category as the above worthies, and confidently wait for time and events to prove the accuracy of my judgment."

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have an editorial from the New York World read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the New York World, Mar. 15, 1912.]

BEING A DEMOCRAT.

Sadly and sorrowfully the Hon William Randolph Hearst reads the Hon. Woodrow Wilson out of the Democratic Party.

In a long and anguished letter to the Washington Post, Mr. Hearst says of the governor of New Jersey:

"The whole trouble with Prof. Wilson is that he is not a Democrat, and does not know how to be a Democrat. His Democratic pose is assumed, and, therefore, awkward and unnatural."

But is there no hope for Woodrow Wilson? Can he never scale the exalted heights of Democracy which Mr. Hearst has attained? We know, of course, that Gov. Wilson began wrong, but perhaps the mistakes of the past can be remedied.

To be truly Democratic, Gov. Wilson should have run as a municipal-ownership candidate for mayor in 1905 in order to defeat the regular Democratic candidate.

In 1906 Gov. Wilson should have spent $250,000 organizing an Independence League to name him for governor, and then used this league to club a stolen nomination from Murphy after Grady had "done the dirtiest day's work of my life."

In 1907 Gov. Wilson should have gone into partnership with the Republican bosses and the Republican machine and placed a "fusion" ticket in the field against the Democratic ticket.

In 1908 Gov. Wilson should have financed and nominated an independent Presidential ticket to help Taft and Roosevelt defeat Bryan.

In 1909 Gov. Wilson should have run as an independent candidate for mayor against the Democratic candidate, with the support of Chauncey M. Depew, the Republican bosses, and other "reform" elements.

In 1910 Gov. Wilson should have been an independent candidate for lieutenant governor in the hope of defeating the Democratic ticket and keeping the Republicans in power in Albany.

In 1911 Gov. Wilson should have again nominated a "fusion" ticket in partnership with the Republican machine. Then, as soon as his "fusion" ticket was beaten and it became apparent that the Democratic Party had a chance of winning the Presidency, he should have formally announced his return to Democracy.

Woodrow Wilson may not know "how to be a Democrat," but William Randolph Hearst knows. In comparison with Mr. Hearst, no other Democrat ever was a Democrat. He is the only known specimen of his kind.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial just read be printed in the RECORD, to follow the editorial submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the other side remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has used 27 minutes.

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

[Mr. GARNER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONNELL].

Mr. CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk a selection from a speech delivered last night in the city of New York by a former President of the United States bearing on the condition of the Republican Party.

The Clerk read as follows:

"It is your fight; it is not a fight for me," he concluded. "It is a fight for you. I am trying to keep the Republican Party true to its traditions of 60 years. The Republican Party was founded to protect the oppressed and to rule in behalf of the lowly and to give us a genuine rule of the people. Our opponents are false to the great traditions of the party when they try to twist and turn it into an instrument of privilege and the great special interests. I want the Republican Party to be what it was in the days of Lincoln."

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, how much time is left on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has 33 minutes left.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I have asked this concession of time to discuss a bill which is not now pending, but which will be before the House in a few days, when it will be impossible for me to be present. That is a bill that proposes to lay a tax on matches, in the manufacture of which phosphorus is used. It has been reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, and I understand will come up in a few days, and because of my opposition to the bill I want to make a few remarks this morning in justification of the vote that I expect to cast against it, because I will not have the opportunity to speak when the bill comes before the House.

The bill, in my opinion, is contrary to correct economic policy. It is contrary to all the teachings of the Democratic Party, so far as I am able to understand it. It is not the purpose to raise revenue for which this tax is levied on these matches. That is confessed. The purpose is to destroy the industry because the use of phosphorus in the manufacture of matches creates or engenders disease among the operatives, and for that reason it is proposed to tax the industry to death. That, according to my opinion, is contrary to the Democratic theory of the taxing power of the Federal Government.

The constitutional authority under which the taxing power is exercised is in the following language:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises—

And so forth. If there is any limitation upon the power to lay and collect taxes, that same limitation applies to the power to "lay and collect imposts and duties." If there is any limitation on the power to collect "imposts and duties," that same limitation must apply to the collection of "taxes." I think no lawyer will controvert that proposition. They are all contained in the same section.

I desire now to call the attention of the Democratic side of this House particularly to the position which our party has taken on that fundamental principle. The last victory that we won in the country was in 1892, and I hope that now, as we are entering upon this campaign, believing that we ought to be successful, we will not give the lie to the declaration of principles upon which we went to the country in 1892 and secured a favorable verdict.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman said he believed the Democratic Party ought to be successful. Does he believe they will be successful?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, of course individual opinion amounts to very little. I believe we will be successful, and I know we ought to be. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In the platform of 1892 the Democratic Party said this:

We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue only, and we demand that the collection of such taxes shall be limited to the necessities of the Government when honestly and economically administered.

I believe that to be correct governmental policy. I believe that to be the only purpose for which the power to lay and collect taxes was granted to the Federal Government when our Constitution was framed; and if Democrats expect to go to the country denouncing the policy of laying imposts and duties for purposes other than raising revenue, I ask how can we expect the people to take us seriously if now, in this Democratic House, we abandon that theory and deliberately lay taxes here for a purpose other than to raise revenue?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that I am in full sympathy with the views being expressed by him. As I understand his position it is that this attempt to suppress the manufacture of these phosphorus matches by levying taxes on matches is a misuse of the taxing power.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. Just as the Democratic Party contended, in days gone by, that the levying of a tax on State banks of issue was an abuse of the taxing power.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Absolutely.

Mr. BURLESON. And that the attempt to tax out of existence the oleomargarine industry was a prostitution of the taxing power.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I agree fully with that.

Mr. MANN. When did the Democratic Party take that position about oleomargarine?

Mr. BURLESON. That has always been its policy.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Whatever position the Democratic Party took on the oleomargarine question I know not. The matter was never mentioned in any platform.

Mr. BURLESON. But the same principle applied.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Absolutely; and that bill when it was before the House did not receive the vote of a majority of the Democratic Members of the House, but was objected to by them.

Mr. BURLESON. On this very ground.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. And I am glad to say that it also was objected to by the distinguished leader of the minority, Mr. MANN.

I would not be misunderstood. My information upon the matter of the phosphorus matches is very meager, and with all due respect to the House I think the information which this House has is very meager. Assuming, however, that all that is claimed by the proponents of this bill is true, and that the operatives in these factories are subjected to conditions which render them liable to contract and spread this loathsome disease—admitting all that to be true, if I were a member of a legislature of one of the States, clothed with absolute power to deal with the question, I would not hesitate then to enact such legislation as would be necessary to stamp out that industry and forbid it. But that is a matter which has not been confided to the Federal Congress by the Constitution, and if this bill were amended in its title so as to show the truth, that it is a bill "to protect the health of the operatives in these factories," or a bill "to suppress the manufacture of phosphorus matches," the Supreme Court, I take it, would not hesitate to declare it unconstitutional.

In the cases that have come before the court heretofore respecting oleomargarine, the bank tax and the opium tax, the court has had too much respect for the legislative branch of the Government to assume that we were proceeding under false pretenses. For that reason the court would not go behind the declaration of Congress that the oleomargarine bill was a bill to raise revenue. In the system of government under which we live there are certain powers vested in Congress and certain powers reserved to the States.

Gentlemen insist that the Federal Congress alone has the power to stamp out this enterprise and protect the lives and health of the operatives in these factories. I deny this. I assert on the contrary that the Federal Government has no such power, but that the States in which these factories are located do have ample, full, and exclusive power. It is absolutely a matter of police power, and the police power was not delegated to the Federal Government outside of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and the Constitution states in express words, so that no man might ever misunderstand it, that—

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

In the license cases reported in the Fifth Howard, the Supreme Court of the United States said:

> * * * The acknowledged police power of a State extends often to the destruction of property. A nuisance may be abated. Everything prejudicial to the health or morals of a city may be removed. Merchandise from a port where a contagious disease prevails, being liable to communicate the disease, may be excluded; and in extreme cases it may be thrown into the sea. This comes in direct conflict with the regulation of commerce; and yet no one doubts the local power. It is a power essential to self-preservation and exists necessarily in every organized community. It is indeed the law of nature, and is possessed by man in his individual capacity. He may resist that which does him harm, whether he be assailed by an assassin or approached by poison. And it is the settled construction of every regulation of commerce that, under the sanction of its general laws, no person can introduced into a community malignant diseases, or anything which contaminates its morals or endangers its safety. And this is an acknowledged principle applicable to all general regulations. Individuals in the enjoyment of their own rights must be careful not to injure the rights of others.
> From the explosive nature of gunpowder a city may exclude it. Now, this is an article of commerce, and is not known to carry infectious disease; yet to guard against a contingent injury, a city may prohibit its introduction. These exceptions are always implied in commercial regulations, where the General Government is admitted to have exclusive power.
> They are not regulations of commerce, but acts of self-preservation. And although they affect commerce to some extent, yet such effect is the result of the exercise of an undoubted power in the State.

Just one more sentence from the same case. I read now from the opinion of Justice Grier, speaking of the police powers:

> As subjects of legislation they are from their very nature of primary importance; they lie at the foundation of social existence; they are for the protection of life and liberty, and necessarily compel all laws on subjects of secondary importance which relate only to property, convenience, or luxury to recede when they come in conflict or collision. Salus populi suprema lex.

I could quote any number of decisions from the same court, but the question is too well settled to admit of controversy.

In the case of McCulough against Maryland, with which we are all familiar, the great Chief Justice laid down the rule by which to test the application of the implied powers of the Constitution in these words:

> Let the end be legitimate; let it be within the scope of the Constitution; and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

Will any gentleman on this floor, will any Democrat who subscribes to the fundamental principle of the Democratic Party, "that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose or collect taxes except for the purpose of revenue only," insist that the end sought to be attained by this bill is "legitimate"; that it is "within the scope of the Constitution"? No one pretends that the purpose of this bill is to collect revenue. In the report which accompanies the bill the committee plainly declares that the purpose of the bill is not to raise revenue. I quote from the report:

> The committee have always been responsive to the humanitarian demands of the situation, but from the beginning have been confronted with the difficult problem of determining the advisability of using the taxing power of the National Government to suppress the use of poisonous phosphorus in this industry, which, as has been shown in other countries that prohibit the use of poisonous phosphorus, can be carried on without it, profitably and satisfactorily. It is believed, however, that a situation like the one now presented in the match industry will rarely arise, and hence the committee feels that their action in favorably recommending the passage of H. R. 20842 will not serve as a precedent for the general employment of the taxing power to correct objectionable features of industries. Not only have the European countries prohibited this evil by legislation, but in 1906 they entered into the Berne treaty to prohibit it. Most of the American manufacturers are willing to have the use of poisonous phosphorus prohibited in the match industry, but no one of them desires to stand alone in eliminating it, as that would put such a manufacturer at great disadvantage. This is due to the fact that the other methods used in making matches are slightly more expensive, but, according to the testimony, not so much as to affect the price of matches to the consumer.

Now, note the concluding sentence of the report:

> From this view of the situation the committee is determined, without admitting the establishment of any precedent, to recommend the passage of H. R. 20842.

Angels and ministers of grace, defend us! Without admitting the establishment of any precedent! Whenever in the future it becomes desirable in the opinion of a majority on this floor to invade the police power of any State, to tax out of existence any industry which the States may choose to authorize, but which for any reason whatsoever Congress may prefer to destroy, is it the opinion of this committee that after the passage of this bill, which acknowledges and declares that Congress has such power under section 8 of Article I of the Constitution, no one will point to it as a precedent, simply because in their report they refused to admit it to be?

Mr. Chairman, I have made no attempt to prepare a speech upon this subject, and I am speaking at random, but I want to call the attention of the committee in the few minutes I have to the following. Chief Justice Marshall, in my opinion the greatest jurist in the tide of time, and according to the opinion of Jefferson the chief sinner among the broad constructionists, said this:

> Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government. No direct general power over these subjects is granted to Congress, and consequently they remain subject to State legislation.

Is it necessary to quote authority for the statement that the Democratic Party has always adhered to the doctrine that the activities of the General Government should be strictly confined to the exercise of the powers surrendered to it by the Constitution and has insisted that the reserved powers of the States should not be encroached upon? Let me read what the Democratic platform says upon that subject:

> During all these years the Democratic Party has resisted the tendency of selfish interests to the centralization of governmental power and steadfastly maintained the integrity of the dual system of government established by the founders of this Republic of republics. Under its guidance and teachings the great principle of local self-government has found its best expression in the maintenance of the rights of the States and in its assertion of the necessity of confining the General Government to the exercise of the powers granted by the Constitution of the United States.

That, in my opinion, is the correct policy. If we are now to go on record as a party—and the Democratic Party is responsible for whatever legislation is enacted in this House—as abandoning that policy at this time, let no man lay the flattering unction to his soul that this will not some good day in the future rise up to vex us. Those of us from the part of the country from which I hail do not have to dip into the future far as human eye can see to find an instance where this power will be misused and, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] said, prostituted. It has already been done. If we can exercise the power to lay taxes for any other purpose than to raise revenue, then we can exercise that power for any purpose that suits our fancy or convenience.

A few years ago, for the sole and only purpose of destroying an enterprise which was competing with another industry in this country, this power was invoked and a prohibitive tax levied on the manufacture of oleomargarine, not because oleomargarine was an unhealthful diet, not because it was a food which was deleterious to health, because the expert testimony showed that it was not, but solely because one industry in this country was powerful enough upon the floor of this House to strangle another industry which came in competition with it. So it shall come to pass with other industries in the future, if we continue along the course pointed out by this bill.

The States have the power to suppress this industry if they want to do it, and I have no respect for a State that would come to Congress and say, "If we, in the exercise of the power which is ours under the Constitution, stamp out these disease-breeding enterprises, other States will let it exist, and therefore we will have crippled an industry in our own State by subjecting it to unfair competition, and some gentlemen who are now making money out of it will not be able to do so thereafter." In other words, when it comes to choosing between destroying an enterprise which breeds diseases that kill women, children, and men and fostering that enterprise because it pays dividends, and the legislature of a State, clothed with full power to act, deliberately prefers to foster that enterprise unless Congress will outlaw all similar and competing enterprises elsewhere, then I say that State has not my respect. Now, I want to read just a little passage from Washington's Farewell Address referring to the lodgment of power in separate sovereignties in the dual system of this country. I want to call attention to this because Washington was not a Democrat. I have called attention to the opinion of Marshall, who was not a Democrat. Listen to this:

It is important that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus—

Now, mark these words—

and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by amendments in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good—

And we are assured by those gentlemen advocating this bill that in this particular instance it will be an instrument of good—for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want——

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman time to yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. MANN. We can probably get more time for the gentleman. The gentleman has been talking about the levying of an internal-revenue tax upon white phosphorus matches. I believe the gentleman is aware that the bill to which he refers goes a great deal further than that.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. It provides that the manufacturer of matches of any kind shall conduct his business under the surveillance of officers and agents of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall furnish bond, be penalized if he does not register with the collector of the district——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It could go no further, unless we make the same requirement of everybody in any kind of business——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Absolutely. It means to take over all business in all the States whenever in the opinion of Congress—think of it, whenever in the opinion of Congress—the States are not enforcing their police powers in such a manner as to commend it to the wisdom of Congress, and that, too, under the guise of the exercise of the taxing power. This report says that it is not the purpose to collect revenue; in fact, if they thought anybody could pay it, they would raise the tax higher, so as to make it impossible for them to pay it.

Mr. MANN. There is no revenue here imposed upon matches other than white phosphorus matches.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No.

Mr. MANN. But under the bill any manufacturer of red-top matches must conduct his business under the control of Treasury agents. Does the gentleman think that even by any broad stretch of imagination the Constitution of the United States conferred that authority upon Congress over business located in the States?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do not.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question? What is the difference between the authority extending the power of Congress over the business of matches by this bill and the authority conferred by Congress——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. STANLEY. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended one minute.

Mr. COOPER. I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. STANLEY. And the authority exercised by Congress over the manufacture and distillation of, say, spirits, vinous and malt liquors.

Mr. MANN. So far as the bill proposes to levy internal-revenue tax, of course, Congress has the authority, but if Congress did not levy an internal-revenue tax on the manufacture of spiritous liquors, I take it no one would claim they could go into a State and control the manufacture of liquor or that they could control the manufacture of any article on which they did not impose a tax, as this bill proposes to do.

Mr. STANLEY. The purpose of the bill, as I understand it, is to secure a tax——

Mr. MANN. The levying of a tax upon white phosphorus matches does not confer any authority to go into the business of the manufacturing of some other kind of matches upon which no tax is levied.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The time may come, let me to say to the gentleman from Kentucky, when in this House there will be a sufficient majority which will reach the conclusion that the sale of alcoholic liquors and the manufacture of whisky and beer in this country are bad things. And therefore Congress will levy a tax, if necessary——

Mr. MANN. The time is here now.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; perhaps the time is here. And Congress will levy a tax of $100 or $500 a gallon on whisky and $100 a barrel on beer and destroy the industry.

Mr. STANLEY. I think it will have this right.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I think if it has this right, it will have that. And there can be no question of the fact that whisky has wrecked more homes than the manufacture of white phosphorus matches. It has spread more disease and caused more human suffering and more tears and more crime in this country than the manufacture of phosphorus matches or the manufacture of anything else. And if we can go into the States and break down the barriers that were set by the Constitution and regulate this matter, we can go into the State and regulate any other matter that suits our sweet will. And if we have the police power, or, rather, if we usurp police power, to say that no State may manufacture whisky or beer, then we can also by the same usurpation say that no State can prohibit such manufacture.

I want to close with this. It is an extract which is familiar to you all, and one which ought to be, in my opinion, a lamp to our feet, a guide to our actions in this House, whenever we come to determine whether a reserved power shall remain with the State or whether the Federal Government shall go into the State and destroy it:

The support of the State governments in all their rights as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns and the surest bulwark against antirepublican tendencies, the preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad.

That you all recognize as an extract from Mr. Jefferson's first inaugural address, and I hope in this day of grace when we are looking to the ides of next November to bring the great party which he founded back into power in this Government, we will not handicap those who go upon the stump this summer to advocate the principles of that party and to inveigh against the policy of levying taxes for any purpose save for that only of raising revenue; and I therefore hope that this House will not pursue the fatal policy provided in this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I am receiving a great many letters and petitions from my constituents in opposition to any legislation looking to the restoration of the canteen in the Army, and many of them from ministers.

Recently I received a letter from one of my good ministerial friends, an earnest Christian worker, the Rev. John T. Brabner Smith, of Blunt, S. Dak., requesting that I have inserted in the RECORD a letter dated January 10, 1912, from Gen. Frederick D. Grant, in which he expressed the opinion that the canteen ought not to be restored, and in compliance with that request and for the information of the House, I submit the letter, which is as follows:

GEN. FREDERICK D. GRANT OPPOSES RESTORATION OF CANTEEN.

(In a letter to the editor of the Union Signal, Gen. Grant states that, owing to the changed conditions in the Army, he would not recommend the restoration of the canteen.)

GOVERNORS ISLAND, N. Y., January 10, 1912.

MY DEAR EDITOR: In reply to your telegram, I hasten to say that many times in the past, in official reports, I have recommended the restoration of the canteen in the Army.

This I did, believing that the canteen was the lesser of two evils. In the course of 10 years the enlisted personnel of the Army has changed, and the soldiers who are now in the Army have adjusted themselves to present conditions.

If the question were left to me, owing to this change of conditions, I would not recommend the restoration of the canteen.

Yours, very truly,

FREDERICK D. GRANT.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk now proceed to read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, $555,500.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the total should be $550,500. I move to amend by striking out the word "five" before the word "thousand," in line 2, page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 2, by striking out the word "five" before the word "thousand."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Chinese secretary, legation to China, $3,600.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph, line 11, for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. This seems to be a new paragraph, and I would like to inquire the necessity for including this paragraph in the bill this year.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the titles of these officials have been slightly changed. The Japanese secretary to the embassy at Japan has always received a salary of $3,600, and the same is true with regard to the Chinese secretary.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am not referring to the Chinese secretary. That is true. But the Turkish secretary of embassy seems to be new entirely.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the title of this secretary was made the same as the title of the secretary to China and Japan. The salary of the secretary of embassy to Turkey was made the same as the salary of these other two secretaries, because he performs not only the same duties, but greater and more important and onerous duties.

Mr. HAMLIN. Heretofore, however, there has been no secretary of the embassy to Turkey, has there? There has been no salary paid——

Mr. SULZER. Oh, yes. The salary was $3,000.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then this does not change the salary at all?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; it increases the salary $600, making it the same as the salary of the Chinese secretary and the Japanese secretary.

Mr. MANN. Do you not think it the same thing? You formerly had an interpreter there.

Mr. HAMLIN. It occurred to me that in the bill a year ago and in the preceding years——

Mr. MANN. Now, you propose to give him the rank of secretary?

Mr. SULZER. Quite so. It is recommended by the State Department, and the testimony before the committee shows that this official performs the duties of a secretary, and that these duties are very responsible and important. Our relations with Turkey are becoming more important every day, and it is necessary that we should have a secretary to the embassy.

Mr. MANN. You expend more money there than anywhere else and get fewer results.

Mr. SULZER. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. I think we expend more money there than in any other embassy and get less results.

Mr. HAMLIN. While I am on my feet, in that same connection, there appears on page 6 of the bill——

Mr. SULZER. We will discuss that when we reach it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not know whether we had better wait. It will depend as to whether I make the point of order on the explanation that is made.

Mr. SULZER. Let us take it up when we reach page 6.

Mr. HAMLIN. But I would like to inquire now what is the necessity of a secretary and assistant secretary.

Mr. SULZER. I shall be glad to explain it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not know whether I shall waive the point of order here without an explanation. In the same bill there is an item creating a new office of assistant secretary, at $2,000.

Mr. KENDALL. I think that matter is explained very satisfactorily on page 6 of the hearings by the Secretary of State, in which he said that the demands on the Turkish secretary in Constantinople are so great that he thinks he ought to have an assistant, and he explains here the demands that are made upon an additional secretary.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is no secretary there now.

Mr. KENDALL. The gentleman has been performing the functions of a secretary under a different name. Now he is called a secretary.

Mr. SULZER. That is the only difference, and a slight increase of pay—the only increase of salary in the entire bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. As I understand the facts, you have increased it $2,600—$600 to the secretary and $2,000 to the assistant.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the assistant secretary is new, because the secretary there is unable to perform the duties required of him. He has too much to do. It is a very important diplomatic post. There is a great deal of work to be done by our embassy in Constantinople.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman from New York yield for just a moment?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly; in a moment. On page 6 of the hearings before the committee Secretary Knox said: "The demands upon the Turkish secretary at Constantinople are so great that we thought he ought to have an assistant, and the suggestion is that the assistant be chosen from the student interpreters who have been trained for work of this character. We utilize those student interpreters wherever we can."

Mr. KENDALL. The State Department has selected one of the student interpreters to be the assistant secretary, and that will relieve the Government of the expense of maintaining that one student interpreter who becomes the assistant secretary to the secretary of the embassy, so that no additional expense is involved to the Government by the appointment of the assistant secretary.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman quite certain about that? Is it not a fact that for years we have been appropriating for student interpreters at this embassy, and that we will continue hereafter the same number of student interpreters that are now there? We make in this bill the same appropriation for student interpreters that we have heretofore made. But the fact is they have discovered a bright young man who is a student interpreter, and they want to retain him in the service, and propose to offer him $2,000 and call him an "assistant secretary."

Mr. KENDALL. I have no doubt it will be necessary to maintain a corps of student interpreters at that point for a long time—indefinitely, perhaps. That is the opinion of the Secretary of State. The student interpreter in this case who is to be advanced to the position of assistant secretary of the embassy is, as the gentleman from Illinois suggested, an exceptionally bright young man, and I think that arrangement ought to be made there.

Mr. MANN. But there will be no reduction in the number of student interpreters.

Mr. KENDALL. I have not said that there will be a reduction in the expense of maintaining these student interpreters.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understood the gentleman to say that this will not involve an increased expense in the maintenance of student interpreters.

Mr. KENDALL. I think this promotion of the student interpreter to assistant secretary will not increase the expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa be allowed to finish his statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENDALL. But I think that the necessity which now exists for the maintenance of a corps of student interpreters in Turkey will continue indefinitely, and that it will be necessary in the future to increase the number as our business expands there and a greater variety of work devolves upon the foreign office there.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to take occasion now to say that I believe that the committee are to be congratulated upon the work they have done in the preparing of this bill. I do not want to put myself in the position of criticizing their work, but I am also thoroughly convinced that there is no end to the demands for increased salaries and increased positions, not only in the State Department, but in the other departments of the Government. I only reserved this point of order, and may make it with the hope of finding out now why this increase is recommended. There is an increase unquestionably. The statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL] convinces me thoroughly that there is an increase of $600 a year for this one secretary, and then an increase of $2,000 in the position of the assistant secretary, which is sought to be created by this bill. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] very well said, it will not do to say that there will be no increase because a student interpreter is to be selected for this place, because another student interpreter will take his place; and, of course, we would be at the same expense for him that we would be for this one. I believe there ought to be some good reason given for this increase of expense of $2,600 to this one embassy to Turkey before these increases are permitted to pass in this bill.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that the estimate submitted for these secretaries was $5,000 each—a total of $15,000. The bill as reported by the committee appropriates only $10,800, a decrease of $4,200 from the estimates submitted. This amount is made up by the items to pay the salary of the Japanese secretary at Tokyo, $3,600; the Chinese secretary at Peking, China, $3,600; and the Turkish secretary at Constantinople, Turkey, $3,600. Let me explain that these officers are not, as their titles seem to imply, Japanese, Chinese, and Turkish. They are all American citizens. The Japanese secretary at Tokyo now receives $3,600 salary, the Chinese secretary at Peking now receives a salary of $3,600, and the official doing the work of the Turkish secretary at Constantinople has received for years a salary of $3,000.

These posts can be properly filed only by men who have spent a large part of their lives in the countries named and are, in addition, students and scholars. Owing to the highly specialized character of their work, the tenure of these three posts should be of comparatively long duration, and for the same reason these positions should be at least equal in dignity and in salary to the average consular post in China, Japan, and Turkey.

Moreover, there has been established in these countries the system of student interpreters appointed to study the language of the country to which they are assigned for duty with a view to qualifying themselves for appointment to the diplomatic or consular posts in those countries which require a knowledge of the native language. After completing their language studies these students become eligible to the various grades of the Consular Service, and may ultimately attain the highest, at salaries ranging from $6,000 to $8,000. The language secretaryships at these three missions should be graded in point of rank and salary as to attract the best of the available men who possess the requisite knowledge of the language and other special qualifications to these posts, rather than to the more lucrative but less responsible consular appointments.

The Secretary of State, in the estimates for 1913, recommended that the salary of each one of these secretaries be raised to $5,000. The committee has left the salaries of the Japanese secretary and the Chinese secretary as they are now, at $3,600, and has increased the salary of the Turkish secretary from $3,000 to $3,600, to put this official upon an equality in salary with the other two; and he certainly ought to be put upon that equality.

The Secretary of State is of opinion that the increase recommended should be allowed, as more commensurate with the importance of these officers and the work performed by them. In his letter explaining the estimates, House Document 341, Sixty-second Congress, second session, the Secretary of State, in support of this recommendation, says as follows:

The official correspondence between the Chinese Government and the legation is conducted in the Chinese language.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am not raising any question about the Chinese secretary, but——

Mr. SULZER. Does the gentleman want to know about the Turkish secretary——

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; about this officer in Turkey and his assistant.

Mr. SULZER. It does not create a new office. It is just a new title. The official there now receives $3,000. He is an American and has received that salary for a number of years past.

Mr. HAMLIN. What is the necessity of increasing his salary? Simply to bring him up to the level of the others?

Mr. SULZER. He does the same work, only more; and we propose to make his salary the same because he is doing that work and more important work. That is all there is to that.

Mr. HAMLIN. I withdraw the point of order on this particular item, but I may renew it on the other when we reach it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Why do the secretaries to Japan, Turkey, and China draw more salary than the secretaries to Great Britain, France, Germany, and those other countries?

Mr. SULZER. Because of their peculiar importance, and the responsibilities are much greater.

Mr. MADDEN. In what respect?

Mr. SULZER. The official correspondence between the embassies and the foreign Governments is all carried on in Chinese, Japanese, and Turkish, as the case may be, and it involves a great deal of technical knowledge, proficiency in translation, and familiarity with languages.

It is impossible to get a competent man to take one of these places and live decently for less than $3,600 a year. As I said to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], the Department of State was insistent that these gentlemen should receive salaries of $5,000 a year, but the Committee on Foreign Affairs did not think it advisable or deem it expedient to recommend the increases this year. We have been exceedingly economical in every line of this bill, keeping ever in view the importance of the service and determined not to cripple its efficiency in any way. I know some salaries should be increased. The reasons for it are meritorious, but we did not see our way clear to do it this year.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it generally considered, then, that the work of the secretaries in these three countries is more important than the work of secretaries in other important countries?

Mr. SULZER. There is no question about that. It is very difficult to get American citizens to take these places who can talk and write Chinese and Japanese and the Turkish languages.

Mr. MADDEN. I presume that the increased salary is largely due to the fact that they are required to understand the language?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; and they perform other and more important duties than the secretaries at the European embassies.

Mr. MANN. I can not quite understand why the difficulty should exist which the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] describes with reference to these places in China. We employ men to teach our officials the Chinese language, naming them as cadets of some sort, and take them over there and at our expense teach them Chinese. The gentleman says that, having done that, the position is much more onerous for them to occupy, because they do not understand Chinese well enough, or because it is difficult to get somebody who does understand Chinese well enough to carry on the correspondence between our representative and the Chinese Government. For what reason do we have these student interpreters in Turkey, China, and Japan, unless when they are through our employees know something about the language? What is the use of providing for these student interpreters unless when they have occupied the time and been paid the salary, which is considerably more than it would cost them to go to college in this country, they have learned the language? What is the use of it all if at the end of that time they do not understand the language well enough to carry on correspondence?

Mr. SULZER. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois I desire to say that the present incumbent of the Chinese post is a learned and very able man, well qualified for the work and very much devoted to it. He became such as a result of years of close study and close application at all times. The present American minister to China has recently stated to the Department that the Chinese secretary is the mainstay of the legation, without whom it would be impossible for the minister efficiently to discharge his duties, and there is no increase of his salary—merely a change of designation.

Mr. MANN. I am not criticizing that. I have no doubt that we have efficient secretaries in all of these places, and I presume very likely they ought to have their salaries increased, as far as that is concerned. I do not, however, see the difficulty of obtaining men to perform this work.

Mr. KENDALL. The department does.

Mr. SULZER. And so would the gentleman if he lived in China. The pay is quite inadequate, all things considered, but the committee would not increase it at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Secretaries of legation to the Argentine Republic, Belgium, Chile, China, Cuba, the Netherlands and Luxemburg, and Spain, at $2,625 each, $18,375.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the Maine has been raised and given burial in the billows of the deep.

Her long service as a human sepulcher is over, thank God.

Her interment in the sea closes the incident, so far as the physical hulk of our first battleship is concerned, but the sacredness and the sorrow connected with her sad mission of the past 14 years will not down.

The patriots of the Maine who gave their lives as a human sacrifice that American honor might be preserved and that Cuba might be free have been returned to their native land amidst our keenest devotion, affection, and the tears of every patriotic American. Our Stars and Stripes in solemn devotion have been at half-mast from ocean to ocean in this Republic emblematic of our love and devotion to the martyrs of the Maine. Our President, our Congress, our Supreme Court, many of the survivors of the tragedy, even many of the gray-haired mothers of the dead, were in attendance to cast a long sad glance at the flower and flag bedraped coffins which bore the last sad remains of the martyred sons.

The able chaplain, who survived the tragedy itself, raised his voice and asked that the blessings of a righteous God fall upon the living and the martyred dead. And as 20,000 citizens sat there in the rain with bared and bowed-down heads, half in grief from the tragedy of long ago and half in joy as a result of their belated return, I could not but pause in bewilderment and wonder who took the initiatory step and contributed most to bring it all about. I could not but pause and wonder who caused this most righteous service on this most hallowed day. [Applause.]

It was then that I recalled that the first word that I had ever heard spoken on the subject in Congress was by the present chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Mr. SULZER. I recalled when I first came here, during the winter of 1907 and 1908, by resolution and by speech he was seeking to get recognition to call up his bill authorizing the raising of the Maine, then pleading with Congress to return their martyred dead, pleading that full justice be done to their heroes who had fallen in their defense. Prompted partially by curiosity and partially by the remarkable occasion, I ascertained that the gentleman from New York, part of the time singly and alone, from 1902 down to the final passage of the authorization to raise the Maine was passed, had worked in season and out for this most righteous and belated cause.

As a result of this untiring labor for the past decade of years on the part of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], a generous and righteous Government last Saturday performed the last sad rites over these least ignoble sons.

To-day, under the spreading oaks of fair Arlington, sleep the remains of America's present-day martyrs and patriots, Cuba's saviors and defenders, and America's most beloved sons. While it is thrice true that honor conferred and respect paid by nations or men do not heal hearts that are broken, still it serves as an offset to grief that could not otherwise well be borne. The initial efforts of the gentleman from New York and the full honor conferred by the Nation will quicken patriotism in the living, serve as a solemn sentry of protection to the living, and undying honor to the dead.

Historians will write more eloquently of him when he is gone, but I shall not let it pass to speak of his efforts thus modestly while he is here. To-day each mother who has a son sleeping there must, in addition to her affections for her country and her flag, love and revere the man who first moved this Government to do this most righteous act. Let it be the wish of all such mothers of this Nation as well that "Long may he be spared in health, vigor, and strength who has served us so well, and may the future be to him all that our keenest expectations hope it will be." [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I would not detract at all from the eulogy which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] has paid to a Democratic ex-candidate for governor of New York; but in order that the record may be kept straight I think it is proper to say at this time that it was not the resolution of the gentleman from New York which became a law at all; that he had nothing whatever to do with the introduction of it or the reporting of it, but that the matter that was reported came from the Committee on Naval Affairs and was reported by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] [applause on the Republican side], and that when it came to the House and was finally adopted in the form that it was I drew it myself. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I understood the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to say, in response to a question I asked him a few minutes ago, that the secretary of legation in China was an American. I wonder if I understood him correctly.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman did.

Mr. MADDEN. If that be the case, I am curious to know why it is that it is found necessary to provide for another secretary to that same country at $2,625 a year.

Mr. SULZER. We have not reached that provision in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. We have just had the item read.

Mr. KENDALL. Line 16.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me that, while the post of secretary to China may be very important, it is not necessary to pay a man $3,600 a year while we pay a man doing like work in England $3,000 a year, and then provide for another man at $2,625 to do the same work.

Mr. SULZER. There may be something in the gentleman's criticism.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if that is not an entirely different position. In the regular diplomatic service a man does not have to have a knowledge of the Chinese language.

Mr. GARNER. The hearings before the committee indicated that it was necessary to have more clerical force in China and Japan than in any other portions of the world.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York to explain why it is that this other secretaryship is necessary in China. In the first case, if the secretary provided for in line 13 be an American it seems to me that there is no need for the secretary provided for in line 16. If, on the other hand, the secretary provided for in line 13 be a Chinaman, then it may be necessary to have an American, as provided for in line 16. If the secretary designated here as Chinese secretary gets $3,600 a year and only does the work required to be done in the Chinese language it may be necessary to have the man provided for in line 16 to do the work in the English language. I would like to get all the information on this subject that is obtainable.

Mr. SULZER. Our Government deems the post in China as very important.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SULZER. The Secretary is unable to perform all the duties, and it is necessary to provide for an assistant secretary. That has been the law for a number of years past; there is no change in the existing law.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit, I want to state that this has been carried heretofore in the diplomatic bill, and that there is a greater amount of money spent on the legation in China than in any other country in the world by the United States. The reasons furnished the committee by the Secretary for that expenditure were various, the principal one being that the conditions that exist, the necessity for interpreters, and for different secretaries to look after different phases of diplomatic work make it necessary to have, I think, possibly more secretaries in China than in any other country in the world.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it not a fact that we have for a great many years had in China three different secretaries, a Chinese secretary and a first secretary of legation and a second secretary of legation, and that this bill makes no change?

Mr. MADDEN. Then the gentleman from New York made a mistake when he said that the secretary was an American.

Mr. SULZER. Oh, no; the secretary is an American.

Mr. LONGWORTH. One of these secretaries has spent many years in China learning the language.

Mr. MANN. Yes; and it is said that he knows everything in China worth knowing and much that is not. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Secretary of legation to the Dominican Republic and consul-general at Santo Domingo, $2,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I notice that they have combined the secretary of legation in Santo Domingo with the consul general. What is the situation down there now with reference to our treaty with that country concerning collection of duties, and so forth?

Mr. SULZER. This is merely a change in title. There is no other change—no increase in salary.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but what is the situation, if the gentleman has it? We have some peculiar relations with this Republic, and I should like to know if the gentleman can inform the House just what the situation is at present.

Mr. SULZER. The relations of the United States with Santo Domingo are cordial and friendly. The little Republic is prospering.

Mr. MANN. I know that, but what is the situation with reference to the collection of revenue?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Perhaps I can explain from the statement made by Mr. Carr in the hearings. He is the Director of the Consular Bureau of the State Department. He said:

Since the grade of the minister to the Dominican Republic was changed the law has provided for no consul general at Santo Domingo, and one is needed to certify invoices and discharge other duties connected with our commerce. The change involves no additional cost to the Government.

Mr. BURLESON. But that does not answer the question asked by the gentleman from Illinois, who wanted to know the exact relationship that exists between our Government and the Government of Santo Domingo with reference to the collection of revenues, and the extent that it has been modified within the last year or two.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is a question that does not pertain to the bill which we are discussing now, and I think the chairman will be able to answer it better than I.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I may be able to throw a little light upon that subject and answer, in a way, the question of the gentleman from Illinois. Some years ago the Santo Domingo Republic had issued some $20,000,000 of bonds, which were held largely in Europe. Interest had not been paid promptly on these bonds, and the holders thereof were doubtful that the principal, much less the interest, would be paid.

It would appear that the European Governments are not quite as responsive to the wishes of the bankers of those countries as the State Department of our Government is to the financial interests in this country. Hence it seems that an appeal was made by the European bondholders to our banking interests in New York, and as a result an appeal was made to our State Department, with the result that through the President, in 1905, one Jacob Hollander, of Baltimore, was appointed as special fiscal agent to go down to Santo Domingo and see what he could do in the way of arranging the payment of these bonds held in Europe. Our State Department stuffed his pockets full of commissions as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, and perhaps some other things, put him on a gunboat, and sent him down to this little Republic like a mighty warrior going out to conquer, but, in fact, he was only going down there to collect some money for Wall Street and their European allies.

When he got down there, in addition to this foreign indebtedness, he found a large amount of domestic indebtedness, and finally, by scaling down that local indebtedness to about five cents on the dollar and the foreign indebtedness somewhat, he could get that Republic to issue new bonds to take up the old ones, which was satisfactory to Wall Street and their friends, provided the Dominican Government would let Wall Street name the depository of the funds, let our Government collect all their revenues, and virtually guarantee the payment of these new bonds.

That arrangement was made between this Government and the Dominican Republic. The new bonds were issued and turned over to Wall Street or its European allies at about ninety-eight cents on the dollar. The agreement was simply this: That the United States Government should take charge of the customhouses of the Dominican Republic, should collect all the customs dues, and should deposit the money with the Morton Trust Co. in New York, and all bills of every kind and nature, including the interest on the bonds and a certain amount placed to the amortizing fund, should be paid out by the Morton Trust Co. up here in New York. If the revenues each year exceeded a certain sum, then the Dominican Government should be allowed the surplus for internal improvements under the supervision and direction of certain agencies in this country. For this service to these bondholders Hollander was paid $42,000 out of the United States Treasury. I never have been able to understand why this Government should bear the expense of making an arrangement whereby certain private institutions and money lenders should be enabled to collect an indebtedness from another Republic; but that is what was done, and these are our relations, in brief, with the Dominican Republic to-day under a treaty entered into in 1906.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, of course I know perfectly well what the treaty was, but I ask what the present situation is in reference to the collection of the revenues. My recollection from reading some of the reports which have been made is that the collection of revenues down there through the agents that we have has been eminently successful, and has brought not only more than ordinary prosperity to the Republic, but has provided more than the ordinary revenue, in addition to paying the interest and whatever else there is to pay on the indebtedness.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I think that the revenues as reported have been sufficient to meet the payments provided for in the treaty with a surplus to that Republic; but, of course, I know of some complaints by people living in that Republic growing out of certain requirements we have made upon them. How just those criticisms are I do not pretend to say; I do not know. I think that the collection of revenues has been preeminently satisfactory in amounts, but I object most seriously to the idea of taking the money out of the Treasury to aid private individuals or private concerns in the collection of their indebtedness. I believe if we are going to help Wall Street to collect its debts Wall Street ought to pay the expense of it and not the people of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Of course, all this arises out of the Monroe doctrine?

Mr. HAMLIN. No; I think not.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Here are debts due not merely to citizens of the United States, but to citizens of foreign countries, who insist that they shall have the right themselves to enforce the payment of those debts, to put into motion machinery which will require the Republic to pay its debts, or, if the Government of the United States proposes to say to them "Hands off on the American Continent," then it is our duty to in some way see that these Republics pay their indebtedness.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the conditions suggested by the gentleman existed there at that time or that such conditions now exist which would require us to interfere, nor that we can justify our interference on the ground of the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. MANN. My information is that that is exactly what did exist at the time.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, is not this the situation that existed there? There was certain indebtedness owing by the Dominican Republic, some of it in the United States and some of it in Europe. It was a confessed indebtedness, which that Republic was unable to liquidate. The people abroad who were creditors were inclined to enforce the collection of the debt. A situation arose under which we were either compelled to intervene to aid in the collection of the indebtedness or to abandon the Monroe doctrine entirely; otherwise, the governments abroad would have gone down there and enforced the collection of debts as governments usually do.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Would the enforcement of the collection of debts down there necessarily involve an abandonment of the Monroe doctrine, I will ask the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. KENDALL. We have a principle which was enunciated a good many years ago, which goes by the name of the Monroe doctrine, under which we decline to allow any foreign power to occupy territory on this hemisphere.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Ah, to annex any territory, but not to collect debts or to chastise people for nonpayment of debts.

Mr. KENDALL. I think the Monroe doctrine has a broader interpretation attributed to it than that suggested by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is a mighty good thing to read the Monroe doctrine and see just what it does say.

Mr. KENDALL. Of course I do not claim to have read it as intelligently as the gentleman from Texas, but I have deliberated upon it. I think it justly implies that our Government will not allow any other government, under any pretext, to assume control of territory upon the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] has said better than I could have said just what I started to say when he asked the privilege of interrupting me. The Monroe doctrine, as I understand it, is not encroached upon or interfered with if any other nation should take steps to collect an indebtedness that some American republic might owe them.

The Monroe doctrine briefly stated is this: It is the policy of the United States to regard any attempt on the part of the European powers to gain a foothold in this hemisphere by conquest or to acquire any new establishment in North or South America as an act hostile to the United States. Yet it does not contravene the right of any nation to enforce indemnity for injuries to its subjects, physical or financial, but applies only to territorial aggression by foreign powers.

The doctrine is based upon two passages in President Monroe's message. The first passage referred to the boundary dispute in the Northwest, between Russia, Great Britain, and the United States, and the other particularly referred to the broad principles underlying that doctrine as follows:

The occasion has been judged proper for asserting as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent conditions which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers.

The Monroe doctrine is simply a declaration upon our part that we will not permit any European power to establish any kind of a government in any manner hostile to us upon the Western Hemisphere, but it in no way pledges us to a protectorate over other American States, or to preclude any European power from employing force in the settlement of their just demands against any nation upon this continent.

In 1842 Great Britain blockaded San Juan de Nicaragua, and in 1851 laid an embargo on the entire western coast of Salvador, and in 1903 the combined German and English fleets maintained a blockade of the Venezuelan coast to secure the collection of their claims for indemnity. The requirements of the Monroe doctrine as a national policy were fully met with the assurance to the United States of good faith on the part of the powers concerned and that no Venezuelan territory would be taken in settlement of the indemnity.

Mr. Chairman, if this is a fair outline of the Monroe doctrine, and I believe it is, our conduct in going down to Santo Domingo and taking charge of their customhouses, collecting their revenue, depositing it in the banks of our own country, and auditing their accounts, in fact, administering upon their affairs, can not be justified on the ground that the Monroe doctrine committed us to this policy. We may as well confess the truth and admit that we did it simply because the holders of those Dominican bonds—Wall Street and their European allies—wanted us to do it and, of course, to do it at the expense of the people of the United States, which we did at an expense of over $40,000. This conduct does not meet my ideas of a proper administration of the affairs of this Government, and I do not believe, when they understand it, it will meet with the approval of the people of this country.

The evidence before our committee showed that there was a great deal of internal indebtedness owing from one citizen to another. It is true that default had been made in the payment of interest upon these old bonds, and the bondholders were exceedingly anxious about it, and they simply appealed to our Government to go down there and take charge of the customhouses of that Republic and administer its affairs. In other words, collect the debts of these banks at the expense of the Government by making an arrangement with the Dominican Republic whereby new bonds were issued and we virtually guaranteed the payment of every one of them.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will.

Mr. MANN. I want to ask the gentleman what he would do under conditions like these. Suppose these debts are owned by one of the European powers, or the citizens of one of the European powers, and their Government wished to protect their rights and insisted upon the payment of the debt. Does the gentleman think we ought to permit that power to take possession of the customhouses and collect the revenues at the customhouses of that country until the debts are paid, which may be never? That is the position, I understand, laid down by the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Missouri, and I doubt whether they want to go that far. If we say that one of the other powers can collect debts due its citizens, how can you collect them? There is no court to enforce it; there is only one way to enforce it, and that is to take possession of the customhouses and ports. Are the gentlemen prepared to say that we could afford to submit to that procedure?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly. The powers have that right, and they ought to have that right to collect their just debts, but not to acquire territory in a hostile manner, for they then would violate the Monroe doctrine.

Now, I will ask the gentleman a question: Does the gentleman think that this Government ought to take charge of all the affairs of the South American Republics, all of those that happen to become indebted, and guarantee the payment of their debts to some foreign citizens or governments?

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to say what I think the Government ought to do in all cases which may arise, or one which one can imagine might arise, under the Monroe doctrine, and no one else is prepared to say—I think no one would be prepared to formulate a definite policy upon that line—but I am prepared to say I think it would be very unfortunate if this country should permit a foreign power to take possession, under the plea of collecting indebtedness, of a port or a country in one of the other American Republics and hold it until the debt was paid, because that would mean permanent occupation. I see no escape from the proposition that we can not permit the other powers to do it, and that in not permitting them to do it we do have certain responsibilities ourselves. How far we ought to go I do not know. I am in hopes of keeping out of it just as much as possible.

Mr. HAMLIN. Of course, if a foreign nation should seize the customhouses of a nation on this hemisphere under the pretense of collecting a debt and then refuse to release them, that would present another question, but such a thing is not at all likely to ever occur. Since our intervention down at Santo Domingo was primarily for the benefit of those bondholders, does the gentleman think the expense ought to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not know whether it ought to be or not, but I would far rather expend a little money out of the Treasury in a matter of intervention of that sort than to expend it on the Army and Navy in time of war; it is not only much cheaper, but much more comfortable.

Mr. HAMLIN. There was no occasion for war. The other countries were simply demanding that the Dominican Republic pay their citizens what was due them. This they had a right to demand, if the claims were just, and could not have been the basis for war between enlightened and civilized nations.

Mr. MANN. There might have been war if we had not done it, not with Santo Domingo, but with other powers.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is too remote. It is too much like wondering what would have become of Columbus if the world had proven to have been flat.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. On the subject introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] I want to read a statement submitted by the Secretary of State on the situation in the San Dominican Republic at the time to which reference has been made:

In 1904 the Dominican Republic presented a situation which threatened to lead to the gravest consequences, so far as the United States was concerned. For years the country had been torn by internal dissension and revolutions, until the instability of the so-called Government had become a byword and the credit of the nation had been reduced to such a condition that usurious rates of interest were demanded and obtained by those who were willing to furnish the tottering Republic with funds. It was also customary for the lenders of money to demand as security for the payment of interest and principal the hypothecation of the revenues of the various seaports of the country, until at length the Dominican people found themselves in a position where practically the revenues of every port in the Republic were pledged for the payment of debts. There were no funds left wherewith to maintain the Government, the total revenues from imports and exports had for years been insufficient to meet even the interest on the outstanding indebtedness, and the people of the island had been brought face to face with national bankruptcy.

In this posture of affairs the creditors of the nation, who were for the greater part Europeans, had become clamorous for the payment of arrears of interest and for the enforcement of the pledges of the revenues of the various ports of the country, which pledges it had been found necessary to violate if funds were to be had for the General Government. Protocols of the settlement of the various debts had been signed with Germany, Spain, and Italy two years previously, with the terms of which it had been impossible for the Dominican Republic to comply, and the creditors had decided to invoke the aid of their Governments in the collection of what they claimed to be their due. An Italian warship was actually dispatched to Dominican waters for the enforcement of the agreements with Italian subjects. The Monroe doctrine, indeed, seemed menaced and the Dominican Government appealed to the Government of the United States for assistance in its extremity.

And the United States Government answered that appeal by adopting the course suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. And I undertake to say, in view of the situation that existed there at that time, that if the Federal Government at Washington had declined to intervene its action would have been a virtual abandonment of the Monroe doctrine. [Applause.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, that which we are calling the Monroe doctrine may be a sort of progressive game of international politics, but I do not believe it. In the minds of some gentlemen it does seem to be, but there is needless confusion as to the precise meaning of that celebrated doctrine.

Mr. Monroe, in December, 1823, sent his message to Congress, and in it is found these words:

The occasion has been judged proper for asserting as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent station which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonizing by any European power.

Of course, the President meant political colonies.

And then he goes on to state that any interference on the part of the Governments of Europe, or any combination of them in the interests of Spain or in the interest of the Holy Alliance, would only be regarded as an act of unfriendliness on their part toward the United States.

Mr. Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, in 1826, in interpreting that part of Mr. Monroe's message, said:

The amount of it was that this Government could not look with indifference on any combination among other powers to assist Spain in her war against the South American States; and we could not but consider any such combination as dangerous or unfriendly to us.

And in another speech on the same subject he said:

It did not commit us to take up arms on any indication of hostile feeling by the powers of Europe toward South America.

Now, other gentlemen of eminence, perhaps not so great or so learned as Mr. Webster, but men who occupied exalted stations and who are renowned in the history of this country, followed his view. And later, when Mr. Richard Olney, another great citizen of Massachusetts, was Secretary of State, he gave this interpretation of it. He sent it to Minister Bayard during the consideration of the Venezuelan boundary question. He said:

It does not establish a general protectorate by the United States over other American States. It does not relieve any American State from its obligations as fixed by international law nor prevent any European power directly interested from enforcing such obligations or from inflicting merited punishment for the breach of them.

And it does not assume, permit me to say, that it becomes our duty to chastise defaulting creditors in the interests of any government on earth.

It does not contemplate—

Says Mr. Olney—

any interference in the internal affairs of any American State.

I will say in passing that that is a statement by a great statesman and an honored officer of this Government which ought to sink into the minds of all people, particularly at this time, when they would involve us, if they could do so, in complications that would be expensive and injurious to us politically. Mr. Olney goes on to state:

The rule in question (the Monroe doctrine) has but a single purpose and object. It is that no European power or combination of European powers shall forcibly deprive an American State of the right and power of self-government and for shaping for itself its own political fortunes.

In 1902 and 1903 Italy and England and Germany blockaded a Venezuelan port. It was done for the purpose of compelling the settlement of debts due to the subjects of those kingdoms. It is known in history as the "pacific blockade." It was not so pacific perhaps as the word would indicate, when they were there with great warships threatening to bombard the Venezuelan people unless they made arrangements for the payment of these debts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay the salaries of ambassadors, ministers, consuls, and other officers of the United States for the periods actually and necessarily occupied in receiving instructions and in making transits to and from their posts, and while awaiting recognition and authority to act, in pursuance of the provisions of section 1740 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], before he offers his amendment, if a substantive amendment would not permit this paragraph to be perfected? Is the gentleman's amendment an amendment to this paragraph?

Mr. HAMLIN. To this paragraph. It is only to make it conform to the wording usually carried in the bill. It does not change it any.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Statutes," in line 20, add:

Or so much thereof as shall be necessary.

Mr. MANN. Not "'or' so much"?

Mr. HAMLIN. The word "or" ought not to be there.

Mr. MANN. If the amendment was not inserted, you might as well strike out the paragraph from the bill. It does not mean anything without the amendment.

Mr. SULZER. I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant Turkish secretary to the embassy to Turkey, to be appointed from the corps of student interpreters, $2,000.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph. It is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the ground of the point of order?

Mr. HAMLIN. It has not been provided for heretofore by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman from Missouri will withdraw that point of order. We have already discussed at length the importance of these embassies in Peking, China; Tokyo, Japan; and Constantinople, Turkey.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it the contention of the gentleman from New York that it is not subject to a point of order?

Mr. SULZER. Only the Turkish matter is subject to a point of order, but I trust the gentleman will withdraw the point of order. It is a very important matter to this Government. It is in the interest of the public service.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] yield?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. This is an increase of only $400?

Mr. SULZER. That is all.

Mr. HAMLIN. How do you make that?

Mr. SULZER. Provision for some years past has been made by Congress for an assistant Chinese secretary of legation to China and an assistant Japanese secretary of embassy to Japan, each appointed from the corps of student interpreters and each having a salary of $2,000. The need of an assistant Turkish secretary of embassy to the embassy at Constantinople is no less great and pressing. It is pointed out by the embassy that—while the post of dragoman (interpreter), considering the title in its literal sense, may be said to have become less important as regards the carrying on of verbal intercourse with the Ottoman Government than in years past, and may, in fact, in the course of time become practically obsolete, yet the amount of work which requires constant attention and pushing at the various Ottoman ministries in conjunction with and following on the representation made by the chief of the mission has generally increased. This work, requiring as it does great patience, tact, and an intimate personal acquaintance with the principal officials and the affairs of the various governmental departments, must be carried out by the permanent dragomans, who should systematically follow up the different pending matters for the purpose of insuring their passage through the channels of Turkish officialdom. For one man to fill the multifarious duties of the embassy in the above respect is without the bounds of human possibility, and I desire to urge most strongly the present desirability of increasing the dragomanate staff by at least two assistant dragomans.

Mr. HAMLIN. There will be another student interpreter to take his place. You provide in the bill for a large number of student interpreters.

Mr. LONGWORTH. He is to be appointed from the student interpreters. It would not necessarily mean a new position.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. KENDALL. What we are trying to do, Mr. Chairman, is to prevail upon the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will withhold it for a minute.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It may be a detailed person. The student interpreters receive a salary of $400 only.

Mr. HAMLIN. The bill carries a full complement of student interpreters, does it not? Now, here you take one from that list to fill this position, and you will have to appoint another to take his place. And you are mistaken when you say it is an increase of only $400.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think not, because this provision particularly says that he shall be appointed from the corps of student interpreters. He is to be appointed from the corps of student interpreters.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand that he is to come from the corps of student interpreters, but the bill carries the usual amount for the student interpreters, the usual appropriation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; because they are now in existence. But this position will be provided for when one of these student interpreters is made an assistant secretary at a salary of $2,000.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; and some other student interpreter will take his place.

Mr. SULZER. We provide for student interpreters to whom we pay so much every year. We can not have more student interpreters than are now provided. There will be no more student interpreters.

Mr. HAMLIN. But you provide the same amount in this bill for student interpreters.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. Here is a suggestion from the Secretary of State, made when he was before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with reference to the very subject that is now under discussion in the Committee of the Whole. The Secretary said that "the demands on the Turkish secretary at Constantinople are so great that he ought to have an assistant," and he said that "the assistant should be taken from the student interpreters, who are trained to work of this character. We utilize these student interpreters wherever we can," indicating that the creation of an assistant secretary, after he shall have been appointed from that corps, will not necessitate the employment of another student interpreter.

However, Mr. Chairman, I think it highly probable that as time elapses and our business at that port expands and increases and multiplies, as it is constantly doing, there will be need for more of these student interpreters. I do not think our Government has made any advance in the Far East comparable with that made at Constantinople within the last few years. Hereafter there will be a necessity for an increased force of interpreters and secretaries and others to transact the business devolving upon that embassy.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the gentleman be willing to withdraw his point of order if the number of student interpreters were cut down?

Mr. HAMLIN. No. I am inclined to think we ought to appropriate in accordance with the amount of work over there, but I do not think we are justified in giving them a secretary at an increase of $600 and then giving them an assistant secretary at a salary of $2,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we have at present a secretary to the legation at Constantinople, Turkey; next we have a second secretary at Constantinople; next we have a third secretary there; next we have a Turkish secretary of embassy; next we have an assistant Turkish secretary to the embassy. The other is "Turkish secretary of the embassy." I do not know whether or not there is any distinction between that and the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Next we have 10 student interpreters at the embassy. Here are 3 secretaries at the embassy, 2 Turkish secretaries to the embassy, and 10 student interpreters. I really can see no occasion for it. Our trade is not growing with Turkey to any great extent. We do not have the complications with Turkey that the European powers have. What little we do have may be or may not be very well taken care of. But the only purpose of this is to promote, I suppose, some bright student interpreter to a permanent position. But——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MANN. But he will no longer be a student interpreter when he is promoted to this position of assistant secretary. Another student interpreter takes his place, very properly. So that it is not a matter of expense with me. I do not care to throw away $2,000, but I do not think that would stand in the way of anyone here to have proper representation there. But they apparently seem to have a very large representation there already. Now I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman for information about this matter. Am I correct in supposing that the student interpreter is put at these missions, like that at Constantinople and those in Japan and China and elsewhere, because that appears to be the only practical way of recruiting our consular service with men who understand the languages of those countries, and is it or is it not limited to what may be the reasonable requirements of the service? There are two questions there. I would be glad if the gentleman from Illinois will kindly inform me as to what his opinion is.

Mr. MANN. My opinion has not always agreed with that of the State Department in reference to that, I will say to the gentleman. I think we have carried too many student interpreters at the different places. But they have always urged that we should take some young Americans there and teach them the language. If the only ones who learn those languages in those countries are the student interpreters, we would be very badly off, no doubt.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do they, as a matter of fact, learn those languages?

Mr. MANN. I suppose they do. They have nothing else to do, and my information is that they do and they do very well. They agree to stay in the service for five years. Probably at the end of that time most of them go out and obtain private employment, to which I have no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I merely want to call the attention of my colleague from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] to the fact that it seems that the whole amount of increase involved in this discussion is $200. These interpreters are originally employed at $1,000. Then their salary is increased to $1,200, $1,500, $1,600, and finally $1,800. Now, this assistant secretary is to be appointed from the corps of interpreters, and I suppose if they promote a man from that corps to the position of assistant secretary they take the one who has served the longest and who probably now receives $1,800. Here it is proposed to raise his salary to $2,000 and call him an assistant secretary.

Mr. SULZER. He is doing the work now.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Missouri or some one else tell us from what appropriation these gentlemen are paid at the rate of $1,600 and $1,800 a year?

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, just a word, and then I do not care to say anything more about it. Either the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], the very efficient chairman of the committee, or my colleague from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] is mistaken. The gentleman from New York says that if this point of order is sustained it will very seriously cripple the service. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT], my colleague, says that it will only make a change of $200 in salary; that they have got this clerk now; but that he ought to have $2,000 instead of $1,800. One or the other of these gentlemen is mistaken. This question seems to be mixed with some little doubt about the true facts. My interpretation of this bill is this: The bill provides for 10 student interpreters at the embassy in Turkey.

If they take one of them and make him an assistant secretary, somebody else will take his place as a student interpreter, and the expense of this student, whatever it is—$1,500 or $1,800—will be incurred on account of the other fellow being made an assistant secretary. So, after all is said and done, when you brush all the smoke away you find that it will mean an increase of $2,000 per year. I have not heard any good reason for this increase. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] has said it will cripple the service if this increase is not made. My colleague from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] says they have got the fellow now, and that it only increases his salary $200. Therefore, in order to settle an unsettled question, I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SULZER. That is only in regard to the assistant Turkish secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph beginning with line 8, page 6.

Mr. SULZER. Lines 8, 9, and 10.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the paragraph referred to. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTINGENT EXPENSES, FOREIGN MISSIONS.

To enable the President to provide, at the public expense, all such stationery, blanks, records, and other books, seals, presses, flags, and signs as he shall think necessary for the several embassies and legations in the transaction of their business, and also for rent, repairs, postage, telegrams, furniture, messenger service, compensation of kavasses, guards, dragomans, and porters, including compensation of interpreters, and the compensation of dispatch agents at London, New York, San Francisco, and New Orleans, and for traveling and miscellaneous expenses of embassies and legations, and for printing in the Department of State, and for loss on bills of exchange to and from embassies and legations, $300,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read. I will ask the gentleman why the words "New Orleans" have been inserted in line 10, page 9? Just what are the duties of these dispatch agents?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Kentucky, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a letter from the Secretary of State, which, I believe, will explain the matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 11, 1911.

The honorable the Secretary of the Treasury.

SIR: This department having found it necessary, in order to more satisfactorily provide for the shipment of supplies, etc., to consular and diplomatic officers in Central and South America, to establish a dispatch agency at New Orleans and to appoint a dispatch agent there, I have the honor to request that you will submit to the present session of Congress the following change in the wording of the appropriation for the contingent expenses of foreign missions for the current and for ensuing fiscal years, without increasing the amount of the appropriation, namely:

"To enable the President to provide, at the public expense, all such stationery, blanks, records, and other books, seals, presses, flags, and signs as he shall think necessary for the several embassies and legations in the transaction of their business, and also for rent, postage, telegrams, furniture, messenger service, compensation of Kavasses, guards, dragomans, and porters, including compensation of interpreters, and the compensation of dispatch agents at London, New York, San Francisco, and New Orleans, and for traveling and miscellaneous expenses of embassies and legations, and for printing in the Department of State, and for loss on bills of exchange to and from embassies and legations, $375,000."

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
P. C. KNOX.

Mr. SHERLEY. I should like to know just what these dispatch agents do, and what actual increase of cost, if any, will be incurred by virtue of establishing a dispatch agent at New Orleans.

Mr. SULZER. The Secretary of State says it will require no additional expense.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; he said he did not ask for any additional appropriation. He did not say it would not incur any additional expense.

Mr. SULZER. I will say to the gentleman that the adoption of the speedier and more convenient route of transmission of the official diplomatic pouches between the Department of State and the legations in the Central American States via New Orleans, and the shipment by way of that port of official supplies for the legations and consulates in those countries and the countries of the western coast of South America, has made necessary the establishment of a dispatch agency at that city, and provision for the payment of the agent out of the appropriation for contingent expenses, foreign missions, is requested in the item for that general object without any increase in the appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. What does the gentleman mean by dispatch agents? I may be stupid, but I do not gather just what functions these agents perform.

Mr. SULZER. All the mail, all the material for the different consulates in Central and South America—that is, on the western coast of South America—now go by way of New Orleans. In that city the Department of State has a dispatch agent who takes care of the mail pouches and all this material for the consulates, sees to it that the same is properly put aboard the vessels in New Orleans and sent to the various destinations.

Mr. MANN. And he also sees to forwarding the ordinary supplies, typewriting machines, and so forth.

Mr. SULZER. Everything in connection with the consulates.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does not mean to say that the State Department has to have an agent for the purpose of sending these supplies to the different consulates? I understood the gentleman to say that the mail pouches are dispatched by this agent.

Mr. SULZER. Yes; all mail from the Department of State goes in the State Department mail pouches to the various consulates in Central and South America.

Mr. SHERLEY. Instead of going by the regular method through the mail?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that I have looked into this matter. I had the same impression that I think the gentleman from Kentucky has.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have not any.

Mr. HAMLIN. That these dispatch agents are useless agents. The testimony shows that the duty of a dispatch agent, whether he is in New York or New Orleans or San Francisco, is that when the State Department makes up the pouches of mail to be sent to Europe they go to New York, and the duty of the dispatch agent is to get the pouches, see that they are in good shape, properly labeled, and hurry them, perhaps ahead of the ordinary mail, to the proper ship which will take them on the way instead of letting them go by the ordinary usual route.

Mr. SULZER. That is correct.

Mr. SHERLEY. In other words, the Department of State thinks it is necessary to send the mail in this way, because the post-office service is inferior?

Mr. MANN. Not at all; the State Department sends its mail in sealed pouches.

Mr. SHERLEY. The statement made by the gentleman was that the dispatch agent had to see that the mail pouch arrived in good condition and was sent off as speedily as possible, and they had this special agent to look out for it instead of leaving it to the postal authorities.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that these pouches ordinarily could not go through the Post Office Department the way it is put up in sealed pouches, because there is no authority for the Post Office Department to handle them in sealed pouches. It does not come under the provisions of the International Postal Union.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have not the slightest doubt that with the exception of a few communications of a private character all of these communications could be sent as ordinary mail matter, but the State Department still clings to the mysteries that have been shrouding foreign transactions for 100 years and probably will 100 years from now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky make the point of order?

Mr. SULZER. I trust the gentleman will not.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will not press the point of order, although I have not obtained the information that I asked for.

Mr. MANN. I want to make this suggestion. I looked this up recently and they are using steamers going out of New Orleans for portions of the Central American Republics and possibly for the South American Republics.

Mr. SULZER. New Orleans is a very important distributing place—and becoming more so.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am inclined to think that if agencies ought to be maintained in other places one ought to be at New Orleans. For that reason I will not press the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

EMERGENCIES ARISING IN THE DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE.

To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service, and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States, to be expended pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $50,000: Provided, however, That the vouchers for the money expended under this appropriation shall be itemized, and the same shall be subject, whenever required, to the inspection of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate, or either of them.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee a question. This is a reduction of the emergency fund from $90,000?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; the committee reduced it from $90,000 to $50,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the gentleman from New York confident that this will not cripple the service?

Mr. SULZER. In the judgment of the committee the department can get along next year with $50,000 for emergency purposes. So far I have heard no complaint regarding this reduction. It is quite a saving to the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can the gentleman say how long the appropriation was as high as $90,000?

Mr. SULZER. Several years.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And this is the first time there has been such a substantial reduction?

Mr. SULZER. The first time in several years.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from New York states on his responsibility as chairman of the committee that this will not, in his opinion, in any way hamper the best interests of the service?

Mr. SULZER. If I thought it would cripple the good work of the State Department I would be opposed to the reduction.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know the average yearly expenditure under this appropriation?

Mr. SULZER. There has generally been expended all of the money that Congress allows.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman state that the expenditures have been extravagant, that the Secretary of State has spent more money than he ought to have spent?

Mr. SULZER. I do not.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman makes that statement and believes that the expenditure has been properly made in the past, does he not think that the reduction from the former amount of the appropriation to the present is unjustifiable?

Mr. SULZER. Our distinguished Secretary of State is a wise man, and I doubt not will cut his cloth accordingly.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he does not think that this information should be subject to the inspection of the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department? It seems to me peculiarly appropriate that the chairman of that committee, even more than the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, should have access to that information.

Mr. SULZER. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, that the Committee on Foreign Affairs gave much time and consideration to this limitation. We think we have gone quite far enough in regard to the matter. After much deliberation we came to the conclusion that this limitation was wise, and quite as far as the committee ought to go. The Committee on Foreign Affairs deals direct with the State Department, and, of course, more or less with the diplomatic relations of the Government. The Committee on Expenditures in the State Department does not. This emergency fund is a diplomatic matter. It should be confidential. It should not in our opinion go beyond the scope of the limitation which the committee has put in the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that this is another instance, I think, of the exaggerated mysteries that are essential in the opinion of some people to the proper conduct of foreign affairs. They seem to forget that the time of sealed communications has gone by, and that we read in the newspapers each morning what is happening in every capital in the world. I shall make the point of order against the paragraph unless it carries in it a provision giving to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, whose express duty it is to examine into these things, the same privilege that is granted here to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have spoken privately to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs about that fact, but my own modesty inclined me not to raise the point that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has raised. I do feel that if this provision is to go in at all it ought to include the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department in the House and also the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department in the Senate.

Mr. SISSON. Why not the entire committee?

Mr. HAMLIN. I have a bill which will cover all of that, and consequently I am not particular about any of this provision; but if it comes in, it ought to include the chairmen of these two committees, because, under the rule of the House, our committees are charged with investigating these expenditures. I think, in the light of certain developments—and I am not going into a discussion of them at any great length, but just want to maek this suggestion—the point is not well taken, that this is purely a diplomatic matter, and consequently no committee ought to have any inside information except the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House and the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate. A practice has grown up in the State Department of expending hundreds and hundreds of dollars which have been specifically appropriated for specific purposes other than that included in the paragraph now under discussion and which have been covered under section 291 of the Revised Statutes, and I now hold in my hand a portion of the certified copies of those certificates. The committee will remember that we raised a question some time ago as to the expenditure of the $20,000 which was appropriated for the celebration of the discovery of Lake Champlain. After a long hard fight we secured copies of the items for which that money was expended, and the Secretary of State very frankly admitted that it was improperly covered by secret certificate; that it ought not to have been so covered. How much more there is of that kind of work I do not know. We find in this bill an item, just passed, of $5,000 for bringing home criminals.

In 1906 there was a similar paragraph carried in the bill of that year. That money was expended and was covered by secret certificates in the Treasury, a certified copy of which I hold in my hand. Yet the appropriation was worded then as it is worded now—for actual expenses for bringing home criminals—ought not to have had the veil of secrecy thrown around it. Every conceivable thing that may excite criticism is covered by secret certificates under section 291 by the State Department. I do maintain most seriously and earnestly that that is a practice which ought to be stopped in some way, and I know of no better way than to turn the light of publicity upon it.

Mr. KENDALL. Will not this correct that condition?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not think it will entirely. It will help that much. As some gentlemen know, I have a bill reported and on the calendar which, if passed by the House and the Senate, will correct this evil. If the Secretary of State understands that the chairmen of the investigating committees in the House and Senate have the right to see the items that he says he is expending money for under this appropriation, it is almost a certainty that he will not expend a penny of it for anything excepting what properly comes under that provision; and it is an impeachment upon the loyalty and upon the manhood of Members of this House to say that they are so unpatriotic if they find an item for which money has been expended that ought not to be made public, that they will make it public. I do not believe the Secretary of State is afraid of anything of that kind. The Foreign Affairs Committee and the Foreign Relations Committee have no power of investigation. Why should they inspect these accounts. I have no objection to it, but it does seem to me that the committees that are specially charged with this work in the House and in the Senate, if this provision is to remain in the bill, ought to be included in it.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Kentucky reserve the point of order?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what the disposition of the gentleman in charge of the bill is?

Mr. MANN. I reserved the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes. I was thinking whether I wanted to make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I think we can get at that very quickly. The gentleman from Kentucky says that he will make a point of order unless they include other officials, and if they do, then I shall make the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, just a few words. It is essential that the President should have at his command a fund for emergency purposes. Of course it is not possible accurately to estimate the amount that will be required to meet them in any one year, but it will be agreed by all, I take it, that the amount should be sufficient to meet an emergency that may arise at any time. In regard to the limitations, as I have said before, the Committee on Foreign Affairs gave the matter much consideration. We discussed it from every angle, and finally came to the conclusion, as we state in the committee report, that this limitation will silence to a very large extent adverse criticism regarding the expenditure of this emergency fund and give to it all the publicity necessary. I trust the people. I trust the greatest servant of the people—the President. I believe that Congress can trust the President of the United States.

So far as I am personally concerned, therefore, I would put no limitation on the expenditure of this money. If we can not trust the President, then we can not trust anyone in public life, and the Republic is doomed.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I also am willing to trust the President of the United States, but this provision was put in here upon the theory that it ought to be within the power of some agency of Congress to look into the matter of expenditures, because while it is very pretty to talk theoretically of our trusting the President of the United States, practically we know that expenditures are made which never come to the knowledge of the President of the United States, and that he is a man with limitations like the rest of us, and could not to save his soul look after the details of expenditures.

And the desire of Congress to look into these matters is no reflection on any President, and could never be so considered by any President, and never will be because any man who will ever be President will have enough common sense to realize that an investigation of expenditures does not necessarily involve a reflection upon him. Now, the point I make is simply this. Inasmuch as the committee is attempting to give to somebody the right, it seems to me they ought to give it as much to the expenditures committee as to the appropriating committee. I think one of the dangers that we are under in Congress under our various methods of appropriating is that those committees appropriating for one department only become in course of time the particular advocates of that department, and they become advocates to such an extent that they resent as an impertinence any other committee considering any matter in connection with that department, and just for that reason if you are going to give the right to investigate at all, give it to a committee that will not feel itself already tied in favor of the department that is to be investigated. Unless the gentleman is willing to let the information go to the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department as well as his own committee, I shall make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on his point of order; I believe he made it first?

Mr. MANN. Well, I have not withdrawn the point of order yet.

The CHAIRMAN. Both gentlemen have made or reserved the point of order.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Kentucky has insisted that he will make the point of order unless some changes are made in it, and those changes have not yet been proposed. I think I would like to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Kentucky, if I may. The gentleman from Kentucky also reports one of these confidential bills to the House, and while he gives information concerning fortifications in a way, neither he nor the department would want to give all the information concerning all the fortifications or the emplacement of guns.

Mr. SHERLEY. In that connection, of course, there are some things that are secret.

Mr. MANN. Certainly there are.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I think there has been a great bugaboo about the fortifications bill, and I have said to the Army and I have said to this House that most of the things that they think ought to be kept secret are better known to the agents of other countries than to the men who are appropriating the money.

Mr. MANN. I agree with the gentleman about that. I think most of the things that are kept secret are kept secret under false ideas, but if there is any one thing in the Government that ought to be kept secret, it is the expenditure of some fund like this by the State Department, and much more reason for it than any other department. I have no doubt whatever that the gentleman from Missouri in the investigation which he has made in this matter may have done some good checking up the State Department so that they would not expend this fund for purposes that they ought not to expend it for, and it is very likely that there has been expenditures made that ought not to have been made out of this fund, but in the end there must be a chance to make expenditures out of some fund which will not become public. You can not pass that around among so many men. Who would you give it to if you wanted to let somebody in the House have the right to make investigations? I have no doubt that under ordinary conditions that any Member most could go up there and have information given to him confidentially, whether he is on either one of the committees or not, but there must be some method, or ought to be, we being practical men, of expending some money without making it public.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has practically covered what I wanted to suggest. My question was simply this: Under the present practice up there the President, of course, is presumed to know how this money is expended. The Secretary of State is presumed to know how it is expended, the three Assistant Secretaries of State, the chief clerk, and perhaps a dozen or more ordinary clerks in the department and the disbursing officer. Now, does the gentleman think that, leaving myself out of it, of course, Senator KENYON, chairman of the Expenditures Committee in the Senate, is less patriotic than all of these parties whom I have mentioned down there; that if he should see an item that ought not to be made public that he would violate that confidence, or that I would violate it?

Mr. MANN. Certainly not; but what good could the gentleman do with the information? Nothing. But, Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs can do something with the information, because he can cut down the appropriation for the ensuing year; but the gentleman from Missouri having the information, what can he do with it? If it is confidential, he can not divulge it.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the gentleman will permit just another word. The gentleman from Missouri would not do anything with an item that ought not to be made public, but the gentleman from Missouri would do something with items that ought not to be kept secret. Now, what has the gentleman to say about the $20,000 that was appropriated to pay the expenses of the celebration on Lake Champlain and which was covered by a secret certificate?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not say anything about it; I do not know anything about it in detail. I do not see any objection to the expenditure of money for that purpose; in fact, it was understood here in the House that the money would be expended for that purpose when the appropriation was made. The gentleman may not be familiar with the fact.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does the gentleman indorse the use of that money to pay the expenses of the members of the Legislature of New York State to that celebration and return?

Mr. MANN. Well, I will say to the gentleman that when they were going to have this celebration up in New York there was at one time a proposition for Congress to make a direct appropriation for it. It was afterwards stated that was not necessary, although Congress was willing to do it, as I understand it, and that the money would be expended from money of the department referring to this appropriation. And I do not see any objection to paying the expenses of the members of the Legislature of the State of New York any more than paying the expenses of gentlemen in this House under certain conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. We have paid expenses of Members of this present House under conditions far more subject to criticism than was the State Department in paying the expenses of whoever they paid expenses for in connection with that celebration. And I am not disposed to drag that out or criticize it. Those are matters of opinion at the time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman as to secrecy of this fund. The reason I suggested the chairman of the investigating committee should have the information is this: That when an investigation of that department is undertaken it may follow certain channels that immediately runs it up against the proposition that these matters are confidential. That results in an unnecessary confusion and frequently necessitates a course very much more harmful to the Government than if the chairman was in a position to have for his own information accurate knowledge of what had occurred. And I do not think it is making it public to simply say that the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, the very committee which is specifically charged with the duty of seeing that moneys are not improperly spent, should have that information. Now, the gentlemen says that the chairman of the appropriating committee ought to have it, because he can do something about it. I do not see how he can do anything about it except he can report a bill with a larger or less appropriation for this particular fund.

Mr. MANN. That is what I mean.

Mr. SHERLEY. The investigating committee can properly bring it to the attention of the House. It does not seem to me that you get undue publicity by adding the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department.

Mr. MANN. Where the gentleman and I do not agree is that I do not think the expenditures ought to be made public unless the State Department is willing to have them made public. I do not think some committee ought to have authority to require expenses to be made public because such expenses are not secret. We do not have to appropriate a dollar if we do not want to do so, and I would be willing to let the ranking member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs have the same privilege, and if they think it is improper to let them have the money they ought not to have the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Does the gentleman from Kentucky make his point of order?

Mr. SHERLEY. I agree with the gentleman that, broadly speaking, the knowledge of expenditures of this fund ought to remain with the State Department. I do not agree with the gentleman that such a condition of affairs might arise under it that it would be improper to make it public to anyone. The very purpose of having anybody to know the inside history of the expenditure is that there may be some judgment other than the State Department as to the wisdom or propriety of the expenditure of the money. Now, the need for secrecy usually exists at the time and immediately afterwards, is rarely a continuing need, and to say that a committee peculiarly charged with the duty of investigating that department should not have the information seems to be totally to misconceive the purpose of these committees. It is true that in the past appropriating committees have been all powerful and investigating committees have been all negligible. But that is not the contemplation of the law creating them, and if we have any publicity it ought to go to the committee that has to do the investigating.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a point of order or withdraw it?

Mr. SHERLEY. We are discussing it for a moment.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a suggestion or two, if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has concluded. I agree entirely with his suggestion that some authority aside from the Secretary of State ought to have the right to review this expenditure of money. This appropriation for emergency purposes has been available in the State Department for many years and generally has equaled or exceeded the $90,000 estimated for the current year. Within the last 12 months a very stringent criticism has been leveled against the Secretary of State because of certain expenditures of this fund which were alleged to be irregular. I think, and I am frank to say it, that the State Department would better have submitted to the committee a candid statement of all the facts that were available, without evasion or equivocation or delay, so that the House of Representatives, which appropriates the money and makes possible the expenditures that are contemplated under this section, would have been in possession of all the facts. Now, I believe we have gone past the time when we can agree with the gentleman from Illinois that there ought to be any fund in the Department of State or any other Department subject to disbursement and that disbursement be concealed from the Congress of the United States which provides it.

The proposition all turns upon this inquiry: What representative of the House and of the Senate should be allowed to inspect the expenditures which have been made by the Secretary of State. I think we are all in substantial agreement that the House and the Senate, through some instrumentality, ought to have supervision over these expenditures, or, at least, ought to have information as to the purpose for which the expenditures have been made. We had the matter before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, as suggested by the chairman, where it received very careful consideration. The Secretary of State was consulted, and I believe the gentleman from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of State, was conferred with, and this provision which we have incorporated in this bill, subject, of course, to a point of order—if a point of order is interposed against it—was the result of our deliberation. It provides that the vouchers for the money expended under this emergency appropriation shall be itemized and subject, whenever required, to the inspection of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield just for a moment?

Mr. KENDALL. I will.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman does not mean to convey the impression, I am sure, that "the gentleman from Missouri"—myself—the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, was consulted?

Mr. KENDALL. I thought the gentleman from Missouri had been consulted.

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, no.

Mr. KENDALL. Then I am in error, and I withdraw that implication. Now, we meet this situation here in the House.

Some gentlemen think we ought to authorize this expenditure subject to the inspection of nobody, and some gentlemen think we ought to allow the inspection to be made by all Members of the House.

And we have this anomalous condition arising: The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] threatens to interpose a point of order, which, of course, will eliminate the provision entirely from the bill, unless the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of State shall also be included; and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] threatens to interpose a point of order, which will be equally effective, if the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department is included. Now, I hope neither of these gentlemen will enforce his threat.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. KENDALL. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman familiar with the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department has reported a bill covering this entire subject, which will give the House of Representatives an opportunity really to study the subject of the safeguards referred to?

Mr. KENDALL. I am not willing to concede that the consideration which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] have given to this subject is not a proper consideration of it.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman will admit that this is only six lines long, and I think the gentleman's bill is nearly six pages long.

Mr. KENDALL. Well, the account of the creation of the world does not occupy much more space in Holy Writ than this provision in the bill. I was going to say that that would be news to the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. It would be, coming from the gentleman from Iowa. It is only a wild guess, and a misstatement at that. [Laughter.]

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute more. I wish to call attention to the deliberation exercised by the gentleman from Illinois when he concluded that I was mistaken in that statement. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa if this proviso received the assent of the entire committee?

Mr. KENDALL. It was submitted to the full committee and it was unanimously indorsed. The entire wisdom of the committee is concentrated in that proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the point of order withdrawn?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the point of order is withdrawn I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. KENDALL. The point of order is only in process of withdrawal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know whether the point of order is pending or not.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman is through I want to make myself clear. I make the point of order against the proviso, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, does the point of order go to the proviso or to the paragraph?

Mr. SULZER. Only to the proviso, after the word "dollars," on line 8, page 11, striking out the balance of the paragraph.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SISSON. If the proviso goes out, ought not the whole paragraph to go out?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was made only to the proviso.

Mr. SISSON. I want to make a point of order as to the whole paragraph if the proviso goes out.

Mr. SULZER. That is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. SISSON. I want to make a point of order to the whole paragraph, on the ground that it is legislation. I do not think, except by unanimous consent, that——

Mr. KENDALL. It is simply the old provision of law, if the proviso goes out.

Mr. MADDEN. This is under the Revised Statutes. This is the law.

Mr. SISSON. I understand; but, Mr. Chairman, I insist that if the proviso is added to the paragraph the whole paragraph ought to go out.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that the proviso is new legislation, and a limitation upon the appropriation. The appropriation itself is made in accordance with law, and is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the point of order is not made to the entire paragraph, as the Chair understood, but only to the proviso.

Mr. SISSON. What is the law that the gentleman refers to?

Mr. BURLESON. Section 291 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] evidently comes too late with his objection. If he had made the point of order in time, the whole paragraph would have gone out on account of it being out of order; but only a part of it was out of order, and it has already been ruled upon.

Mr. SISSON. Those gentlemen who make the point of order on the proviso can not cut off members of the committee from making a point of order against the whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was only to the proviso.

Mr. SISSON. I understand the point of order was made against the whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so understand. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of State to mark the boundary and make the surveys incidental thereto between the Territory of Alaska and the Dominion of Canada, in conformity with the award of the Alaskan Boundary Tribunal and existing treaties, including employment at the seat of government of such surveyors, computers, draftsmen, and clerks as are necessary to reduce field notes; and for the more effective demarcation and mapping, pursuant to the treaty of April 11, 1908, between the United States and Great Britain, of the land and water boundary line between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, as established under existing treaties, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, including employment at the seat of government of such surveyors, computers, draftsmen, and clerks as are necessary to reduce field notes, $75,000, together with the unexpended balance of previous appropriations for these objects.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. May I ask how much is the unexpended balance of these previous appropriations?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Tittman, the Director of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, was before the committee and testified that in his opinion the amount of money herein appropriated would be sufficient if we allowed him the unexpended balance. We did so, and wisely, I think. He testified that the unexpended balance would be about $80,000 or $90,000.

Mr. MANN. We appropriated last year under this item altogether, I believe, $295,000?

Mr. SULZER. We did.

Mr. MANN. You appropriate $75,000, and I take it you do not wish to reduce the progress of the work?

Mr. SULZER. No; it is a very important work, and we do not cripple the work in any way. Mr. Tittman testified that this would be sufficient; that he could get along with it.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that my recollection is, although I do not have the statement before me now, that the gentleman referred to advised the committee that there was an unexpended balance of $94,000. But I am not entirely satisfied that that is correct.

Mr. MANN. That may be sufficient.

Mr. KENDALL. It is sufficient. He said that.

Mr. SULZER. I know of the good work Prof. Tittman is doing. We have appropriated substantially all the money he said he would need for the next fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL PRISON COMMISSION.

For subscription of the United States as an adhering member of the International Prison Commission and the expenses of a commissioner, including preparation of reports, $2,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a separate paragraph, to come in after line 19.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Insert as a separate paragraph, after line 19, page 14:

"The United States shall continue as an adhering member of the International Prison Commission and participate in the work of said commission. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized annually to pay the pro rata share of the United States in the administration expenses of the International Prison Commission and the necessary expenses of a commissioner to represent the United States on said commission at its annual meetings, together with necessary clerical and other expenses, out of any money which shall be appropriated for such purposes from time to time by Congress."

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from New York that this is simply the resolution which his committee has already reported.

Mr. SULZER. I know that. I introduced the resolution. I reported the resolution from the committee. It is on the calendar. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois and to the Members that the reason I did so was to accomplish this very purpose—to put behind this appropriation, which is for a very important matter, a law so that in future it would not be subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, I was going to give the gentleman credit. This is his resolution.

Mr. SULZER. Quite true.

Mr. MANN. It is absolutely his resolution. I do not ask credit for it. The gentleman himself could not very well offer this as an amendment to this bill, the resolution having been reported subsequent to the reporting of this bill; but I think everyone is agreed that we ought to take a course that will make it law.

Mr. SULZER. I think so.

Mr. MANN. This puts it in shape where it will receive attention not only here but in the other body, and I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. I agree with the gentleman, and, in view of the circumstances, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. I renew the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. BURLESON. I will reserve it, certainly. I thought the gentleman had concluded.

Mr. MANN. We have an international prison congress. They had a meeting a couple of years ago here in this country. We participate in that congress, which is of great value. Every prison warden in the United States is familiar with the work of that international prison congress. Last year this item went out of the bill on a point of order, because there was no permanent law for it. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER]—I think very patriotically—introduced this resolution to make this a permanent law, so that we would become an adhering member of that congress.

Mr. BURLESON. What additional expense will it entail on the United States?

Mr. MANN. The total expense is $2,000 a year.

Mr. SULZER. There will be no additional expense. We have paid annually the same amount for years.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does not this propose to increase the expense?

Mr. SULZER. No.

Mr. MANN. Nothing but the $2,000. Congress might increase it, but $2,000 a year is all that is asked for.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, we have been a member of the International Prison Commission ever since 1896, and our pro rata share of the expense has been about $2,000 a year. We have paid it every year except last year, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] made a point of order against it and it went out of the bill on that point of order. I want to say that it is subject to a point of order, and so as to obviate that in the future I introduced a resolution to put behind it a law, and it was reported unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Affairs on March 21, 1912. The Government of the United States is a member of this commission; it participates in its proceedings and derives its share of the benefits of the work accomplished. Of course we should pay our share of the expenses, and there should be a statute to that effect, so that the question of whether the appropriation is authorized or not authorized can not be invoked under the rules of the House.

The object of the International Prison Commission is to study the problems relating to the suppression of crime, the protection of society, the proper treatment of the criminal, the moral rescue of children, the organization of every means for preventing the discharged prisoner from relapsing into a life of crime, and every agency that makes for true prison reform.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is not the point I was asking about. As I understood the reading of the resolution, it provides for the appointment of delegates to this meeting. The gentleman from Illinois says it would only cost $2,000 a year. If we are going to send delegates, it may cost $10,000 or $15,000 a year.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that we have been sending a delegate for years.

Mr. SULZER. We have one delegate.

Mr. MANN. The only purpose of this amendment is to keep this item in the bill over a point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. If it is not contemplated to enlarge the appropriation, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from New York I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HAMLIN. Wait a minute. I shall have to reserve the point until I get my information.

Mr. KENDALL. It simply gives us an official relation to this International Prison Congress; that is all.

Mr. HAMLIN. I should like to get it into my mind a little more clearly that there will be no additional expense.

Mr. KENDALL. There is no additional expense to what we have had year after year.

Mr. MANN. I can not guarantee that Congress will not increase the appropriation in future. No one can guarantee that. The appropriation has been made for years at $2,000 a year. We have had a commissioner all the time. He attends these meetings abroad. To be perfectly frank with the House, most of the expenses are paid by the association outside of Congress.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman from Illinois has just handed me the resolution, and I have only now had the opportunity to read it.

Mr. MANN. That is the resolution.

Mr. HAMLIN. This gives me the information I wanted. I thought it provided for the appointment of a delegation.

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. SULZER. That is quite true.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is what I was asking for. I did not understand it. I withdraw the point of order. I have no objection to this.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to make a request. The Chair has been informed that the notes of the Official Reporter show that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made a point of order to the entire paragraph instead of to the proviso on page 11. The Chair understood it to be against the proviso only, and the discussion which followed seemed to be confined to that; but if the Chair was mistaken, as it seems he was, the Chair would like to ask unanimous consent that his ruling may go to the whole paragraph, and to return to page 11 for that purpose. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] knows of course, and he can state whether he did make a point of order to the proviso or to the whole paragraph.

Mr. MANN. The Chair did not appeal to me at the time, and the matter passed off so quickly that I did not volunteer any information. I did reserve a point of order to the whole paragraph. Later I made a point of order on the proviso, and the Chair sustained the point of order on the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to make his point of order to the proviso.

Mr. SISSON. That being the fact, I asked to be allowed to make a point of order against the entire paragraph, because the point of order had been reserved, not only by the gentleman from Illinois, but the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] stated that unless certain matters mere agreed to he would make the point of order.

Mr. KENDALL. The gentleman from Illinois made the point of order against the proviso.

Mr. SISSON. Since he reserved it on the entire paragraph, I wanted to make it on the entire paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi ask unanimous consent to return to the paragraph for that purpose?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to press the point any further, for the reason that if the committee should favor the paragraph covered by the present law it would vote the paragraph in.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not want to deprive any Member of the privilege of making a point of order by any mistake that the Chair may have made.

Mr. SISSON. That was the only reason I insisted on it; I thought that I was within my rights when I asked to reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

To meet the share of the United States in the expenses for the year 1911 of the International Bureau of the Permanent Court of Arbitration, created under article 22 of the convention concluded at The Hague July 29, 1899, for the pacific settlement of international disputes, $1,250.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry. Heretofore this appropriation has been carried to meet expenses for the calendar year. I wish to ask whether the gentleman omitted that on purpose, or whether it was through error, because where we use the word "year" in an appropriation bill it generally means the fiscal year, and there might be some trouble about it. I think it should be the calendar year, and I move to insert, in line 16, before the word "year," the word "calendar."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 16, page 15, by inserting before the word "year" the word "calendar."

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois, in my judgment, is right, and the word "calendar" should be in there. I see that it is in the estimates sent to the committee by the Secretary of the Treasury. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at end of line 21, page 15: "That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay to the Secretary of State, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the quota of the Congress of the United States as its contribution toward the maintenance of the Bureau of the Interparliamentary Union for the Promotion of International Arbitration at Brussels, Belgium."

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to that.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, this amendment carries no appropriation. It is merely an authorization for an appropriation which has already been made in previous bills. Two years ago the Congress made an appropriation of $2,500 for the maintenance of the International Bureau of the Interparliamentary Union, now located at Brussels. By that appropriation the American Congress has committed us to the policy of supporting that bureau in conjunction with the other parliaments, but by inadvertence the appropriation was left out last year, and this omission has caused considerable embarrassment to the Interparliamentary Union, because it had counted on a contribution which is merely our pro rata share for the maintenance of that international bureau. A point of order was made against it in the House, and the bill went to the Senate where the item was inserted. It came back to the House and the House agreed to it, but it seems that in making up the bill in the final hours of the session of Congress, just before adjournment, the item was inadvertently lost by the clerks, and on that account no appropriation was made last year. We do not ask an appropriation for two years now, but merely ask that Congress contribute its quota for this year in order to keep our faith with the other parliaments of the world. A bill embodying the same terms was presented to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and unanimously recommended by that committee. That bill is now on the calendar of the House, and I sincerely trust, therefore, that the point of order will not be made.

Mr. HAMLIN. The statement which the gentleman from Missouri makes as to there being a bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs now on the House Calendar renders it unnecessary to put the item in this bill, and I shall have to insist on my point of order.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman probably understands that when this bill reaches the Senate, in order to secure action which we ought to have in all fairness and in all justice, this item will be inserted, and then, instead of the popular branch of this Government receiving credit for making the appropriation, the credit will be given to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. SLAYDEN. With the permission of the gentleman who has the floor, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] a question. Do I understand that the gentleman from Missouri favors the enactment of a bill which the gentle- from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] has referred to?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will state frankly that I do not know, for I have not read it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I thought that was a fair inference from the remarks that the gentleman made.

Mr. HAMLIN. I stated that I understood there was such a bill reported by the committee and now on the calendar, and that if so, the gentleman's proposition was not in so bad a condition.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Let me ask the gentleman if he objects to such an appropriation as is proposed here?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will answer that question when we come to it. I am willing that the Senate should have any credit that will be given for this appropriation, and therefore I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SHERLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Curtiss, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions (S. Res. 267):

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. HENRY H. BINGHAM, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That a committee of 11 Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased at Philadelphia.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 1 o'clock and 45 minutes post meridian.

And that in compliance with the foregoing resolution the President pro tempore had appointed as the committee on the part of the Senate Mr. PENROSE, Mr. OLIVER, Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. NELSON, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. BAILEY, Mr. STONE, Mr. NIXON, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. CHILTON.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the payment of the quota of the United States for the support of the International Institute of Agriculture for the calendar year 1913, $4,800.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking for information. Is this International Institute of Agriculture an institution that has its headquarters in Rome?

Mr. SULZER. It is.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And issues an occasional publication?

Mr. SULZER. It issues a great many publications.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to know what benefit it is to anybody except the gentlemen who receive the salary. Does it gather and distribute statistics gathered by boards of trade which are well known to all merchants engaged in international trade long in advance of these publications?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the International Institute of Agriculture in Rome is under the direction of an American citizen, Mr. David Lubin.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Who put it there?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Lubin did, by the generosity of the King of Italy. There is much to be said in favor of this institute and how it was created. Mr. Lubin for years tried to get the Government of the United States to take an interest in agricultural matters—the improvement of the soil, the adaptability of the soil, and all things connected therewith that mean so much in material benefits to the people. However, his pleadings met with deaf ears in the United States. Finally he went to Rome and got the ear of the King of Italy. The King became interested, and out of his own pocket gave the money to establish this International Institute of Agriculture. It is one of the finest buildings in Rome. It is maintained principally by the King of Italy. I believe there are forty-odd Governments now members of this International Institute of Agriculture.

Mr. LEVY. Forty-eight.

Mr. KENDALL. There are 50 now.

Mr. SULZER. The late ranking Republican member of this committee, formerly its distinguished chairman, the late Hon. David Foster, of Vermont, a very dear friend of mine—and no one regrets his untimely death more than I, and when the proper time comes I shall pay due tribute to his memory—informed me that he represented this Government recently at a congress held in this institute and that he had carefully investigated the great work that this International Institute of Agriculture was doing, and was enthusiastic concerning its material results.

[The time of Mr. SLAYDEN having expired, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. SULZER, it was extended for five minutes.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from New York will be willing to grant me some of my own time.

Mr. SULZER. Certainly. I shall be glad to ask that the gentleman's time be further extended. But pardon me if I say that there is nothing in this country to-day that makes so much for its material wealth and progress as the improvement of the soil. The soil experiments which have been made, and the great work which has been done by that dear old man in the Botanic Garden, Hon. William R. Smith, who is about to pass over the great divide to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns, will be a monument to his greatness and his foresight for centuries to come. He has done much for the improvement of the soil and to disseminate knowledge as to the adaptability of the soil. God bless him. He has been a benefactor to his race. Then we have the great wizard, Luther Burbank, of the Pacific coast. We know what he has done along these lines. Then we have this philanthropic American merchant, Mr. David Lubin, a citizen of our country, who has expended a great part of his life and fortune in doing everything that he can do to teach the people what the soil will do if it is properly watered and nourished. Great men, these! Mr. Lubin is entitled to much credit for what he has done. Our Government is an adhering member of this International Institute of Agriculture. We get great benefits from it, and those benefits are distributed all over this country, and they materially help our agriculturists, and anything that will help the agriculturists of our land is a good thing, in my judgment, and I am in favor of it. Nearly all of our wealth comes from the soil. Anything that will teach the people how they can make the soil produce more than it does now, how to make two bushels of grain grow where one grows now, is a good thing, and we ought to do everything we can to promote it. This is no place to economize. Economy here is waste. This appropriation should not be stricken out.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, my question, which was an innocent one and intended merely to elicit a little information, has not accomplished its purpose, but it has given us the benefit of a very entertaining and discursive address by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], who states the perfectly obvious and generally accepted things with persuasive eloquence. Of course we know a great deal of the wealth of the world is derived from agriculture and it ought to be supported and we are all in favor of it, but the gentleman has failed to tell us in any particular what benefit is to come to agriculture or to the commerce of the world from this institute in Rome. I have somewhere, somehow, read or heard that there is one Lubin, who makes extracts, and it occurred to me that perhaps this gentleman might be of that family.

Mr. SULZER. No; no relation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Of course here is an appreciable extract from the Public Treasury, with no appreciable benefit, no perceptible benefit to come from it. I have seen a few of those publications. I took occasion to look over some of them. They publish statistics that have been known to the trade in advance. They gave advice about facts that had occurred so long a time before the publication that there was not a man interested in them who did not know all about it before they were issued from the press in Rome. We all know that water put on the soil will make plants grow. We know if the soil is cultivated the yield will be larger. We do not need to be told those things from a publication office in Rome.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. I think the gentleman's question went to the matter of crop statistics, did it not?

Mr. SLAYDEN. To the whole thing.

Mr. HAYES. Does the gentleman know that the institute of agriculture furnishes to the Department of Agriculture here in Washington those statistics for its use?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not know, but I do know that the Department of Agriculture has always published a great many statistics that had been known to the trade for a long time before they were issued by the Department of Agriculture.

[The time of Mr. SLAYDEN having again expired, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. SULZER, his time was extended for five minutes.]

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman does not mean to imply that he thinks the crop statistics collected by the Department of Agriculture and published for the benefit of the people of the United States are valueless. That is not his claim.

Mr. SLAYDEN. No; I did not say that or anything that warrants that conclusion.

Mr. HAYES. Then, I can not understand why the gentleman should object to statistics officially collected in the same manner for the different countries of the world and supplied to the Department of Agriculture for the use of the United States as well as for the people of other countries.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Well, what I want to say, Mr. Chairman, is this, that we have a bureau here gathering statistics in a very expensive way.

Mr. HAYES. For this country; yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. For this country, and we have agents reporting everywhere on the trade and agricultural products of other countries as well.

Mr. HAYES. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon, the gentleman is in error. Those statistics are furnished——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Put your finger on one single benefit that is done by this institute in Rome. Who reads these reports? Do you?

Mr. HAYES. I do. These statistics are furnished by the International Institute of Agriculture——

Mr. SLAYDEN. What statistics?

Mr. HAYES. Of crops.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Crop statistics of this country?

Mr. HAYES. For all countries except this.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How old is this institution?

Mr. HAYES. Perhaps four years, three years.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What did we do for figures before that?

Mr. HAYES. We did not have any; that is, not official.

Mr. BUTLER. How did we get into the agricultural business over in Rome?

Mr. HAYES. Through a treaty.

Mr. BUTLER. Are we going over there to sell seeds or to buy them?

Mr. HAYES. Neither one.

Mr. SISSON. Does the gentleman know the name of the individual who draws the $3,600 salary?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I understand it is one of Lubin's extracts.

Mr. HAYES. No relation to it.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Lubin draws that salary.

Mr. SISSON. He gets the $3,600?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. How did he go over there? Was he sent over there by the Government, or did he happen to be there and furnish statistics for which he got paid?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. I am simply trying to get information about who gets the salary.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman from Mississippi that our Government has been represented in the International Institute of Agriculture for several years. The last representatives that our Government sent over to Rome to participate in its deliberations were Hon. David J. Foster, a Member of Congress, who died a few days ago, and who was then the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs; Hon. Charles F. Scott, a Member of this House from Kansas, and then the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture; Hon. E. Dana Durand, who was then and is now the head of the Census Bureau; Victor H. Olmsted, whom I do not know——

Mr. BURLESON. He is a statistician of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. SULZER. And Edgar R. Champlin. Those were the delegates we sent over and who participated in the deliberations. They made a report to the Secretary of State. It is printed. I have read it. The institute, from what I learn, is developing and extending its work conscientiously and rapidly. It is a clearing house for information relating to agriculture and allied subjects, contributed by all the principal nations of the world. Its compilations of such information as is embodied in two bulletins heretofore issued—the one relating to social and economic intelligence and the other to agricultural intelligence and plant diseases—are indicative of the value of bulletins along similar lines to be issued hereafter. Information gleaned from all quarters of the globe, when brought together, can hardly fail to contain much information of value to countries not theretofore possessing it, and it appears to me that this appropriation would be a small price for the United States to pay in aid of disseminating such information in the English language among the people of the United States.

Mr. SISSON. How many of them were great agriculturists and great farmers who understood agriculture?

Mr. SULZER. That is not the question. They were experienced and representative men.

Mr. HAYES. It is not agricultural propositions that come before the institute, but statistics, crop statistics, the agricultural statistics of the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I do so in order to say to the gentleman from Mississippi that I have given a good deal of investigation to this International Institute of Agriculture along the lines as to whether it is doing any good or not, and it is my conviction, after careful study, that this institute of agriculture is doing a great deal of good. I want to read in this connection the concluding paragraph of Mr. Foster's report and the report of the gentlemen associated with him to the Secretary of State on their return from Rome:

> The members of the delegation desire in conclusion to express their conviction that the International Institute of Agriculture is destined not only to serve a most useful purpose with respect to the gathering and diffusion of information regarding agriculture and commerce throughout the world, but to fill a much broader sphere of usefulness. It is one of the most potent instrumentalities for the unification of the world, for the promotion of the general welfare of the peoples of the earth, for the establishment and maintenance of closer friendly relations among the nations, and for the further development of that earnest cooperation, that unity of action, which is rapidly making one mind and one heart for the world. An abundance of good food at prices which afford just remuneration to the producer and are at the same time within the means of the consumer is one of the essentials of a high civilization.

That speaks for itself. I deem it most important. The institute is doing a great world work, and we should in justice to our own people contribute our share to its support and maintenance.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I asked the gentleman, and he did not catch the question, how this gentleman got this position.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. David Lubin, as I understand, is appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SISSON. Then why is not this appropriation carried in the agricultural bill?

Mr. KENDALL. He is simply designated by the Secretary of Agriculture. Will the gentleman let me have the floor for a moment?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KENDALL. Years ago Mr. David Lubin became much interested in the matter of international agriculture, and about 1904 or 1905—I have forgotten which year—the United States Government entered into a treaty with a great number of the first-class powers of the world, by which this organization at Rome was recognized, and we became an adhering party to the institute. The King of Italy, largely through the influence of Mr. Lubin, to whom reference was made here, I think, by the gentleman from California, became very deeply concerned in the promotion of the proposition, and he donated a large and very valuable tract of land, together with the money necessary for the construction of a building in which the institute was to be located. The various nations which are parties to this treaty have been contributing annually certain sums of money to support the institute.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. KENDALL. I will.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do those other Governments, 50 of them, I think you say, contribute as much as we do?

Mr. KENDALL. My recollection is that we are one of the smallest contributors of the large Governments.

Mr. SLAYDEN. With this $23,000 you propose to take out of the American Treasury this year?

Mr. KENDALL. My impression is that when we consider powers like France and Germany, our contribution is the smallest of the lot.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] has expired. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. KENDALL. What is the motion?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion was to strike out the last two words of the paragraph.

Mr. KENDALL. If this motion is not to be insisted on, I do not wish to occupy the attention of the committee further.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salary of one member of the permanent committee of the International Institute of Agriculture for the calendar year 1913, $3,600.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against this; but if the gentlemen wish to say something I will reserve it.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to discuss the point of order, but I want to present a few facts that I think will induce the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] not to insist on his point of order. What I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, is this, that these various nations have contributed to the support of the institute, and Mr. Lubin, out of his own private resources, has been devoting his time and his attention and his energy to the promotion of the work. I think he has been there for the past dozen years, maintaining himself at his own expense. He was originally a man of very large means.

I understand that he is not so full handed now as he was previously, but in any event, if this Government is to avail itself of the services of Mr. Lubin in the relation which he has occupied to it in the last dozen years, it ought not to hestitate to make a reasonable allowance for his compensation.

Now, some gentlemen have manifested considerable innocence concerning this institute at Rome, its purposes and functions, and the duties it has been performing. It is simply a State department of agriculture magnified to include the world. We have in Iowa an institution maintained by the State which collects information from every section of the Commonwealth, information on soils, information as to grains, information as to breeding, and all information that is valuable to be employed by people engaged in agriculture, and it has been of incalculable advantage to the people of the State.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield? I can readily understand how it would be profitable in the State of Iowa to gather information from the four corners of the State, but tell me wherein does the profit come to America in gathering this information relative to agriculture from some country that we could not employ here.

Mr. HAYES. It indicates the supply of the material.

Mr. KENDALL. That is the whole thing in a nutshell, or a considerable part of the whole thing in a nutshell.

Mr. BUTLER. Does this help us make a market?

Mr. KENDALL. Certainly it does, and gives us information concerning the production of cereals all over the world.

Mr. HAYES. Of all food products whatever.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What was this valuable information that the gentleman was speaking of in regard to being in tabloid form?

Mr. KENDALL. I said it was a considerable part of it in a nutshell. The gentleman suggested that this institute collected information in reference to crops all over the world, and that its statistics are available for us in this country.

Mr. SLAYDEN. You made a statement about an analysis of the soils and information about the productions of Iowa being gathered. Are they being gathered and sent to Rome to be distributed throughout the world?

Mr. KENDALL. I was simply using that as an illustration, to demonstrate that this institution at Rome is on a large scale. Of course, I do not think it does that work so intelligently or so efficiently as Iowa does on its smaller scale.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do you think we get $23,400 worth of good from this employment?

Mr. KENDALL. I have not the slightest doubt of it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do you not think your price of admission is entirely too high?

Mr. KENDALL. The appropriation is quite moderate, indeed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL] has expired.

Mr. KENDALL. I have not the slightest doubt this has been one of the best investments the Government has ever made.

Mr. HAYES. I wish to be heard on the point of order. I asked the Chair some time ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order had not been made, but only reserved.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I make my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order must be sustained if the gentleman makes it.

Mr. HAYES. Will not the Chair hear me on the point of order? Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is subject to a point of order. I have not the treaty here, but we can get it in a moment. I refer to the treaty we have made not only with Italy, but with all of these other 50 Governments, agreeing to furnish a certain proportion for maintaining the expenses of this institute, which is provided in the first paragraph.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman really mean a treaty?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Ratified by the Senate?

Mr. HAYES. Yes, sir; made by the President and ratified by the Senate.

Mr. KENDALL. And it has also been legislated for?

Mr. HAYES. Yes; it has been legislated for for several years here, in accordance with the treaty. Now, this treaty not only provides for our paying our proportion——

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. The point of order is made against the second paragraph, not the first. The gentleman does not mean that the treaty requires us to pay a man a salary?

Mr. HAYES. No; but it gives us legislative authority for it.

Mr. HAMLIN. We do not need legislative authority. Congress already has that authority.

Mr. KENDALL. Will not the gentleman agree that if the treaty devolves certain obligations upon us, there is ample authority for Congress to appropriate?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly not. You can not confer upon Congress any more authority than it has.

Mr. HAYES. But if you agree by treaty, which is the supreme law of the land, to pay our share of the maintenance of this Institute of Agriculture, the gentleman certainly would not claim that we would not have authority to pay for the attendance of a representative there, without which that institute would be valueless to us.

Mr. HAMLIN. We have authority, but there is no existing law authorizing it; and I make a point of order against it.

Mr. HAYES. I say there is authority for it. The treaty authorizes it; and not only that, but the treaty provides for a biennial assemblage, provided for in the next paragraph, to which we are expected to send representatives. To be sure, under that treaty we are not actually obliged to send the representatives; but after that treaty gives us authority to provide the representation, we have authority to make that appropriation, and last year we did make it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. This paragraph makes an appropriation for the salary of one member. Who is that member?

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Lubin. He is the permanent representative of this country there.

Mr. BUTLER. The next paragraph is for the payment of the expenses of delegates. Who are those?

Mr. HAYES. They are the delegates of this country. They have not yet been appointed, I understand. There were five delegates representing this country at the last assemblage.

Mr. BUTLER. Their expenses are paid out of this appropriation?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. How many Members of the House go as delegates?

Mr. HAYES. Two Members of the House went last year; I think Mr. Scott of Kansas and Mr. Foster of Vermont.

Mr. MANN. One Member and one ex-Member.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Scott was chairman of the Committee on Agriculture at the time he was appointed?

Mr. HAYES. Yes. He was chairman of the Committee on Agriculture at the time he was appointed.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Foster and Mr. Scott were certainly delegates who were competent.

Mr. HAYES. There were also two men from the Department of Agriculture and the Director of the Census. Those three and the two I have mentioned were the delegates.

Mr. BUTLER. I was trying to see if I could not go myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAYES. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, aside from the point of order, very poor policy on the part of this Government; and I should hate to see this Government take that stand, that after having made a treaty with the great powers of the world to make this institute of agriculture a success we should, for the sake of saving an expenditure of a few thousand dollars, fail to bear our share, not only of the expense but our part of what it was intended to be, by sending our delegates there and having the representation of this Government there, as all the other Governments have. I hope the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] will not insist on his point of order.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Have all these other Governments got $4,800 representatives there or $3,600 representatives?

Mr. HAYES. They all have representatives there at $3,600, I presume, but I am not advised as to that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I understood the gentleman to say that Mr. Lubin was a great philanthropist of large wealth, who is doing this work for the benefit of the world at large?

Mr. HAYES. Yes. He has served without salary. He was the representative of this Government without salary, and last year was the first year that he received any salary.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the gentleman can submit something more than mere generalities to show that any benefit has come from this institute to this country or to anybody in this country except Mr. Lubin, I would be glad to hear it.

Mr. HAYES. I will say to the gentleman that no benefit has come to Mr. Lubin.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Three thousand six hundred dollars has come to him, apparently.

Mr. HAYES. He has expended out of his own funds four or five times that much in this work.

Mr. GARNER. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if the Chair is satisfied of his conclusions on this mattter it would be well for him to rule and let us go on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. HAYES. Has the Chair got the treaty there?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not, and the gentleman has not stated the terms of the treaty authorizing this expenditure.

Mr. HAYES. I have seen it often. It provides that——

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the treaty provides that we shall be an adhering member of this institute, and then that we shall pay our proportionate part.

Mr. HAYES. Yes; and it also provides for the attendance of our representatives at the biennial assemblage.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am not making a point of order against that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. FOSTER. Here is the treaty, which says that the International Institute of Agriculture is to be a Government institution, in which each adhering power shall be represented by delegates of its choice.

Mr. HAYES. Composed of one member from each government.

Mr. FOSTER. And then it says that each adherent shall be represented in the permanent committee by one member.

Mr. HAYES. This $3,600 is to pay the salary of the one member of the committee.

Mr. KENDALL. That gives absolute authority for this appropriation.

Mr. HAYES. There is plenty of authority for the appropriation. There is no question about it.

The CHAIRMAN. To what paragraph does the gentleman make his point of order?

Mr. HAMLIN. The second paragraph:

For salary of one member of the permanent committee of the International Institute of Agriculture for the calendar year 1913, $3,600.

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest that the Chair had better look at this treaty.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] that this may be a knotty question, and that the Chair ought to have time to examine into it; and inasmuch as it may be inconvenient to obtain the presence of a quorum to-night, it might be well to adjourn, to give the Chair a chance to examine into this matter.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, in view of what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said, I will move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the gentleman will withhold his motion for a moment, I want to state to the Chair that I expect to make the point of order against the next two paragraphs also.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SIMS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 19212) making appropriation for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

POTASSIUM DEPOSITS ON THE PUBLIC LANDS (H. DOC. NO. 644).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Among the most acute of the problems faced by our agricultural interests is that of the maintenance of soil fertility, and among the elements of greatest value in maintaining this fertility is the element potassium in its various combinations. In an address delivered at St. Paul, Minn., on September 5, 1910, in discussing the withdrawals of phosphate lands, I stated that "phosphorus is one of the three essentials to plant growth, the other elements being nitrogen and potash."

The scientific bureaus of the Government have discovered and classified large areas of public lands underlain by phosphate rock, and the withdrawal act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat., 847), confers upon the Executive ample authority for the protection of these lands until an adequate law for their disposal shall have been enacted. In both of these respects the situation as to potash and nitrogen differs from that as to phosphorus. Until very recently no important deposits of potash salts have been known in the United States, and no law exists to enable the Executive to adequately control the development of such deposits as they may become known.

Recent discoveries by Government scientists in the deserts of the Southwest indicate that in at least one locality potassium salts exist in important commercial quantities in the form of a natural brine. Further explorations are to be initiated at once, and it is hoped that they will result in the discovery of additional deposits whose utilization will inure to the great benefit of the agricultural industry of the United States and may reduce the necessity for continuing the present extensive importations. In the face of this discovery I am confronted by the fact that the laws at present upon our statute books for the disposal of minerals of this type existing upon public lands are inadequate for the protection of the public interests and that there exists no authority for withholding them from disposal until the Congress shall enact an appropriate law.

The greater part of the lands upon which the discoveries now known exist (and it is to be noted that these were made by the use of specific appropriations made by Congress for the purpose) are as yet in public ownership, but may be acquired at any time under the placer mining law by private interests which will have contributed nothing to their discovery, but which can not under the existing law be effectively controlled in the disposition or development of the deposits. Similar results will follow future discoveries at Government expense.

The Secretary of the Interior in his last annual report has called my attention to the fact that the withdrawal act in its present form grants the Executive no authority to protect land valuable for their content of potash or nitrates, both of which should be developed in the public interest for the present and future agricultural needs of the Nation.

The act now reads:

That all lands withdrawn under the provisions of this act shall at all times be open to exploration, discovery, occupation, and purchase under the mining laws of the United States, so far as the same apply to minerals other than coal, oil, gas, and phosphates.

This omits both potash and nitrates from the protection of the law.

The Secretary's ideas of the amendment necessary to correct this condition are embodied in Senate bill 5679, introduced by Senator SMOOT on March 8, 1912. The immediate enactment of this amendment or one of similar tenor will confer upon the Executive the authority necessary to protect these valuable deposits until such time as Congress may enact further legislation providing for their proper disposition. I urge that such action be taken immediately.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 26, 1912.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it was an unpleasant duty the Senate imposed upon the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections when its members were charged with the responsibility of hearing the testimony pertaining to the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON to the United States Senate and of ascertaining whether or not there were used or employed in that election "corrupt methods or practices."

For five weeks that committee heard the testimony, and for a number of weeks thereafter each member of that committee was engaged in the investigation of the testimony and the law before reaching his conclusion.

The Constitution imposes upon the Senate both legislative and judicial responsibilities. They are exclusively legislative, except in two instances: First, it is made the judge of the "elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members;" and, secondly, it is clothed with "the sole power of trying all impeachments." Sitting as legislators we aid in deciding what the law ought to be. Sitting as judges of the election of our Members or in impeachment cases it is our duty to determine what the facts are and what the law was at the time of the occurrence. In my humble judgment we have no more right to ignore the state of the law as it was during the campaign or to decide this case in the light of the law as it ought to have been than we have a right to change the facts in order to conform with the law as it was at the time of their occurrence (1908).

With this conception of the duty which was imposed upon us as members of that committee and as Members of the Senate in the trial of this cause, I feel that no matter how much I may condemn the practices which prevailed in the amount of money expended or the methods of expenditure or the failure to make complete and proper returns, we must decide this case in accordance with the law as we understand it to have been at the time of the election. That is the duty of the Senate sitting as a judge of the election and qualifications of its Members.

But, sitting as legislators and having investigated the manner in which this election was conducted and the methods which there prevailed, if acts were done or means adopted which were inimical to the public welfare, then it is our sworn duty to attempt, at least, to frame some law which will prevent their recurrence.

It is true we are not seated upon woolsacks or clothed with wig and gown, but the responsibilities which surround us are just the same as if we were sitting as the triers of a cause in a court of justice. If, sitting as a judge, this Senate were to determine an issue which was brought before it for trial in accordance with what we conceived the law ought to be instead of in accordance with the law as it obtained at the time of the occurrence of the facts, we would violate every principle of American jurisprudence and we would lie open to the charge of creating judge-made law to suit preconceived notions of the facts of the case.

When the fathers adopted our Federal Constitution and declared that the Senate should be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its Members, it meant—if I understand the English language—that we should sit as judges and in a judicial manner render righteous judgments under the facts as they appear and under the law as it then obtained, and in no other way.

Approaching the subject, therefore, imbued with this conception of the law, we ought not to be swayed from a judicial course in the trial of this issue. I see no inconsistency in judging this case in accordance with the law as it was and at the same time, by legislative acts, making the laws so stringent that the evils which have developed and come to light may never again be permitted to occur in the State of Wisconsin or elsewhere under the jurisdiction of the Stars and Stripes.

Everywhere we hear the cry against judge-made law. Are we, then, to ignore the precedents and practices and customs as they have prevailed at elections for a century and longer and ignore the state of the law as it was at the time this election occurred and decide this case in conformity with a new law, which is to set at naught all of the customs and practices which have heretofore obtained under almost the conceded sanctity of the law itself? Should this be done without declaring the changed conditions in the form of a statute? Must the Senate, sitting in a judicial capacity, decide this case in accordance with judge-made law to suit the changed points of view? Will we not be on safer ground if we adhere to the well-known rules of jurisprudence, and while sitting as judges decide the case in accordance with the law as it was, rather than to combine in this judicial proceeding the attributes both of a judge and a legislator, and now for the first time declare the law to be what it has not heretofore been?

I know that the practices which prevailed at this election and the extravagant use of money by four or five of the candidates at the primaries for the nomination as candidates for the United States Senate are universally and rightly condemned. But because I have come to the conclusion that under the law as I understand it and under the facts as they have been disclosed I do not see my way clear to vote to unseat the Senator from Wisconsin, I deny that it follows that I am in any sense of the word approving the methods which obtained during that election or that I have any sympathy whatever with the extravagant expenditure of vast sums of money. On the contrary, the committee in its report has severely criticized and condemned the methods which obtained during the senatorial primary election. The best thought of the day is a protest against the use of money to influence either directly or indirectly the electorate. No word can be uttered against this extravagant use of money, however harsh it may be, that I will not and do not approve. But at the same time that I condemn the practice of using money excessively I shall not hesitate to place this responsibility in great part where it belongs, and that is here in the Halls of the Congress and in the halls of the General Assembly of the State of Wisconsin, where legislators who have been cognizant of these evil practices failed for so many years to enact laws whereby to prevent their continuance. Up to the time of Senator STEPHENSON'S election there was not a word written in the statute books of the United States or of the Commonwealth of Wisconsin which forbade any of the acts of Senator STEPHENSON, occurring at or before the primary, disclosed in this hearing and which are now complained of by those who are in sympathy with the minority report submitted in this case.

And when I take this position I want to be frankly and fully understood. I do not mean to say that we could legally unseat a Member only where he had violated some statutory law. If in his efforts to secure the election he was guilty of conduct involving moral turpitude, or if he had resorted to acts which constituted bribery under the common law, or if he used other means for the purpose of corrupting voters, or if he was guilty either by himself or through his agents with his knowledge of preventing a free and untrammeled vote, then certainly he could be unseated. Such conduct would be corruption under the principles of the common law.

The Constitution, which makes the Senate the judge of the election, returns and qualifications of its Members, gives it both original and final jurisdiction. No proceeding in error or appeal lies from its edicts. Its decree is as immutable as the laws of the Medes and Persians, but because the Senate has the power to do a thing from which there can be no appeal, ought we not, therefore, to be the more guarded lest we may seem to exercise an arbitrary power, which may be in conflict with every principle of the law of judicial procedure?

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS.

The primary election to determine the choice of party candidates, including the candidates of the several parties for the United States Senate, was held September 1, 1908. Senator STEPHENSON did not determine to be a candidate at this primary until about 60 days before the date of the primary. He had no organization. Four or five other candidates had been actively in the field for months. There were 71 counties in the State and 2,200 election precincts. He first appointed a campaign committee, consisting of Messrs. Edmunds, Sackett, and Puelicher. To Mr. Puelicher he gave at first $50,000. They agreed to take up the organization throughout the State. They were cautioned to keep strictly within the law.

The first act was to circulate nomination petitions throughout the State in order that Mr. STEPHENSON'S name might be placed upon the ballot in conformity with the requirements of the Wisconsin primary-election law. For this purpose men were employed throughout the State, and they were paid for their services. The campaign was then begun in earnest. Senator STEPHENSON, through long years of business and political activity, was well known throughout the State. His friends were hunted up wherever they might be and urged to take an active part in his behalf. Headquarters were opened in Milwaukee, clerks were employed, polling lists were obtained throughout the State, and as these lists were obtained letters urging the Senator's claims were mailed, asking for support. Newspaper men were appealed to, advertisements were inserted, and some editorial support contracted for; lithographs and printed matter were circulated broadcast throughout the State; meetings were held in many places; men were sent over the State at large expense to do canvassing; and as these men went around they employed others in the several communities to spend time in advancing STEPHENSON'S candidacy. Many of these men went to saloons, cigar stores, and every place where the voters might happen to congregate.

Money was expended, to what extent is not clear, but in certain localities a considerable amount for drinks, cigars, and refreshments. Or, in other words, to use the term which has been heretofore used in this debate, "Money was expended for treating." Managers were employed in each of the several counties of the State. In a few instances some of the men had charge of several counties. They organized for the primary election day. They employed men to attend the polls and hired conveyances for the purpose of bringing in the voters. These services, or at least a great part thereof, were paid for.

An examination of the record of the testimony, embracing more than 2,000 pages, will show the extent to which this campaign was conducted. There were a number of other candidates for the Senatorship, and some of them were rich men. Senator STEPHENSON expended in this primary $107,793.05, and he received 56,909 votes; S. A. Cook spent $42,296.26, and he received 45,825 votes; William H. Hatton spent $26,413, and he received 35,552 votes; and Ernest E. McGovern spent $11,063.88, and he received 42,631 votes. The primary cost Senator STEPHENSON $1.89 for every vote he received, S. A. Cook spent 88 cents for every vote he received, W. H. Hatton spent 85 cents for every vote he received, and Ernest E. McGovern spent 26 cents for every vote he received. That this was an extravagant expenditure of money and that the law ought not to have permitted it no one can or will deny.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE LEGISLATURE.

Charges were made at the hearing to the effect that in the proceedings in the legislature efforts were made to corrupt Assemblyman Leuch and Assemblyman Joseph Damochowski by offering money for their votes, and that Assemblymen Farrel, Ramsey, and Towne were kept out of the assembly on March 4, at the time of the final ballot. But an examination of the record will show that, however indiscreet may have been some of the utterances and conduct of these men, it can not be fairly contended that there was any substantial proof of any corruption whatsoever. And I do not understand that the Senators who are now favoring the minority report are making any contention that the proof, in so far as the alleged corrupt use of money in the general assembly is concerned, would justify the unseating of Senator STEPHENSON. I shall therefore confine my discussion to the corrupt practices and methods charged to have been used in connection with the primary.

THE WISCONSIN PRIMARY LAW.

The Wisconsin primary law, in substance, provides (ch. 451, Laws of 1903) as follows:

Party candidates for the office of United States Senator shall be nominated as other officers. (Subdivision 3 of sec. 2.)

Nomination papers for candidates for the office of United States Senator shall be filed in the office of the secretary of state. (Subdivision 1 of sec. 6.)

The person receiving the greatest number of votes at the primary as the candidate for the party for the office voted for shall be the candidate of that party for such office. (Subdivision 1 of sec. 10.)

And the secretary of state is required to publish in the official State paper a statement of the result of the candidates at the primary as soon as the same is certified to him.

It is contended by some that because the Federal Constitution provides that Senators shall be chosen by the legislature, and because Congress has the right to prescribe the time and the manner of holding elections for Senators, and that this power has been exercised by the Congress in the manner prescribed by sections 14 and 15 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, therefore the State has no authority to provide for a primary election governing the selection of party candidates for the position of United States Senator, and that hence any law on this subject is unconstitutional. I do not propose to enter at length into the discussion of this question, except to say that it seems to me it would be a strange position if we were to assume that the people of a sovereign State could not petition the members of the general assembly to elect a given man to the United States Senate. And if they have the right to petition, it would be equally strange to say that they might not do this by a primary as well as by any other known method. And if they have the right to petition, either by a primary or in any other way, it would be stranger still if they do not have the right to provide some method which would guarantee to the petitioners an honest expression of their views.

But it is not necessary for us to speculate upon this proposition, as the Supreme Court of the State of Wisconsin has already passed upon the constitutionality of this statute in the case of State ex rel Van Alstine v. Frear (142 Wis., 320). On page 349 Barnes, judge, in delivering the opinion of the majority of the court, says:

Our constitutions, State and National, guarantee the right of petition. Every citizen of the State has the right to petition the legislature asking that the candidate of his choice be elected United States Senator. Every citizen of a senatorial or assembly district has the right to petition his local representative to the same effect. The lawmaker is thus advised of public sentiment, a potent factor for him to consider in connection with other matters in arriving at a conclusion. Wherein does the primary nomination for United States Senator differ from the exercise of the right of petition? The legislative candidate is thereby informed of something that he has the right to know and of something obligatory, but should treat it as advisory. Moral suasion may be a perfectly legitimate agency to employ even in the election of a United States Senator. That the electors in the exercise of their guaranteed right of petition might do in substance and effect what they now do at the primaries hardly admits of controversy. The framers of the Constitution could not have supposed that there was any impropriety in the people advising their representatives of how they desired them to vote on the Senatorship, else an exception would have been incorporated in the clause guaranteeing the right of petition restricting its application to matters other than the election of United States Senators.

We concede that the result of this primary is not binding upon any member of the legislature. But it is advisory—in other words, persuasive. And I am therefore clearly of the opinion that if the provisions of this primary law have been violated, and corrupt methods at the primaries were shown, it would affect the result of the election by the general assembly, and the Senate would be justified in taking cognizance of that fact and unseating any Member who was thus delinquent.

EXPENDITURES.

It will be impossible to review at length the testimony in this case. I can only hope to give a bird's-eye view of the record, and, without trespassing too long upon the time of the Senate, I shall hope to present it in such a way as to make my position clear. The disbursements, so far as they are disclosed in the record, may be divided into the following classes:

First, moneys paid out to persons employed by Senator STEPHENSON, or in his behalf, to circulate nomination papers in order to get the number of signatures required by the Wisconsin statutes before his name could be placed upon the ticket.

Second, moneys paid out—

(a) To newspapers for political advertising.

(b) For editorial support.

(c) For lithographs, campaign material, postage, telephone, telegraph, and express charges.

(d) Office expenses, including rent, clerk hire, and assistants.

Third, payment for services of speakers, hall rent, music, and for men devoting their time and efforts in cultivating STEPHENSON sentiment throughout the State.

Fourth, moneys expended for workers at the polls and for conveyances and services in getting out the voters.

Fifth, for drinks and cigars.

Sixth, money given to C. C. Wellensgard, L. L. Bancroft, and Thomas Reynolds, who were candidates for the legislature, to be used by them in the interest of Senator STEPHENSON.

Seventh, money paid to the game warden, John W. Stone, for use in the Senator's campaign.

Eighth, $2,000 contributed by Senator STEPHENSON to the State campaign committee for general election purposes.

Ninth, expenses incurred during the session of the general assembly in opening and maintaining headquarters at Madison from the beginning of the session until after March 4, 1909, and for hotel bills and traveling expenses.

No part of the contribution to the general campaign committee or the expenses incident to the headquarters during the session of the general assembly were ever reported to the secretary of state.

The Wisconsin law makes it bribery to offer a voter anything to induce him to sign a nomination paper. Men were employed to circulate these petitions and paid for so doing, but there is no evidence that anyone who signed the petitions was paid or offered anything for signing them.

ELECTION LAWS.

I wish to lay emphasis upon the facts that at the time of Senator STEPHENSON'S election there was no Federal statute determining the class of expenditures which might be permitted; and there was no statute, either Federal or State, limiting the amount of expenditures which might be incurred or made.

The State of Wisconsin did have some statutory regulations on the subject.

Paragraph 1 of section 4478 declared it to be bribery for any person—directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, to give, lend, or agree to give or lend, or offer, promise, or promise to procure or endeavor to procure any money or valuable consideration to or for any voter, to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any person in order to induce any voter to vote or refrain from voting, or do any such act as aforesaid, corruptly, on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election.

Paragraph 2 of this section prevents the giving or procuring, or agreeing to give or procure, or offer, promise, or endeavor to procure any office, place of employment, public or private, to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any other person in order to induce such voter to vote or refrain from voting, or do any such act as aforesaid, corruptly, on account of any voter having voted or refrained from voting.

Paragraph 3 prevents any person from making any SUCH gift, loan, offer, promise, procurement, or agreement as aforesaid to or for any person, in order to induce such person to procure or endeavor to procure the election of any person to a public office or the vote of any voter at any election.

Paragraph 4 provides:

Every person who shall, upon or in consequence of any such gift, loan, offer, promise, procurement, or agreement, procure or engage, promise or endeavor to procure the election of any person to a public office or the vote of any voter at any election—shall be guilty of an offense. Evidently the words "such gift" refer to the kind of giving which is described in the preceding paragraph.

And paragraph 5 reads:

Every person who shall advance or pay or cause to be paid any money to or for the use of any other person with the intent that such money or any part thereof shall be expended in bribery at any election, or who shall knowingly pay or cause to be paid any money, wholly or in part, expended in bribery at any election, shall be guilty of bribery.

There is, however, one section of the Wisconsin statute which I wish to call specially to the attention of the Senate. At the time provision was made for primary elections in the State of Wisconsin a statute was passed under which the criminal penalties applying to a caucus and election were made applicable to primary elections.

That is section 298, and reads:

Every person who, by bribery or corrupt or unlawful means, prevents or attempts to prevent any voter from attending or voting at any caucus mentioned in this act, or who shall give or offer to give any valuable thing or bribe to any officer, inspector, or delegate whose office is created by this act, or who shall give or offer to give any valuable thing or bribe to any elector as a consideration for some act to be done in relation to such caucus or convention * * * shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

By a subsequent statute this section was made applicable to primaries.

None of the expenditures disclosed by the record in this case can come within the inhibitions of these sections, in my judgment, unless it be a violation of the language of the last section:

Or who shall give or offer to give any valuable thing or bribe to any elector as a consideration for some act to be done in relation to such caucus or convention.

If the words "to give any valuable thing" are to receive a comprehensive and literal interpretation, and are to prohibit the giving and offering "of any valuable thing," "as a consideration for some act to be done," it would not have been necessary to write into the statute "or bribe," because the former expression would include the latter. It is a rule of construction that—words of a general import in a statute are limited by words of restricted import immediately following and relating to the same subject. (36 Cyc., 1119, and Nance v. Southern R. R. Co., 149 N. C., 366.)

Lawyers will recognize it to be an established rule, to quote the language of the court in that opinion, that—

In interpreting a statute, where the language is of doubtful meaning, the court will reject an interpretation which would make the statute harsh, oppressive, inequitable, and unduly restrictive of primary private rights.

This statute, in my judgment, clearly refers to the giving of anything of value in the nature of a bribe. The purpose of the statute was, evidently, to prohibit the corrupt giving. And this must be the construction which is placed upon it by the authorities in the State of Wisconsin, because with all the publicity that has been given to this case no attempt has been made to begin any criminal prosecution for any of the acts which were done during or since the primary election.

Again, if a literal interpretation is to be given to the words:

Any valuable thing * * * as a consideration for some act to be done—whether morally corrupt or incorrupt, would the legislature require, as it does, the candidate to convict himself by filing an account? This is a criminal statute, and it must be strictly construed against the State. And when a defendant is charged with its violation every doubt as to the meaning of the statute must be resolved in his favor.

A careful reading of these sections of the statute clearly indicates, in my judgment, that it is "the corrupt giving" which constitutes the offense, and if the statute fails to define what acts are corrupt, then we are obliged to look to the common law in order to ascertain what is or what is not corrupt; and surely if there is any decision anywhere in the States, except where it is specifically forbidden by the statute, that makes it a bribery to employ a man at the polls, or to hire conveyances for the purpose of getting out the vote, or for the purpose of paying advertising, or to incur or pay any of the expenditures to which I have referred, it has not yet been called to the Senate's attention by any of those who have spoken upon the subject, and if any of the Senators have been able to find any such decision, their diligence has surpassed mine.

The proof shows the kind of expenditures which were incurred and paid. The proof shows that the Senator had instructed his managers to keep within the law. The proof does not show that any of this money was expended corruptly. And it seems to me that a careful, dispassionate reading of the record will fail to show that any of this money was in fact expended for a corrupt purpose. I do not say that some of it may not have been expended for a corrupt purpose. I am willing to concede that some of it was probably so expended, but I do say that there is no proof which will justify a fair and unbiased mind in saying that by a preponderance of the weight of the testimony that corruption has been shown. I do not say that where there was a contest such as this must have been some of the agents and representatives of the Senator may not have paid out some of this money corruptly. But we are not to judge of this case by what they may or may not have done. We are to judge of it by what was proven to have been done or left undone. The gist of the offense is not the giving of money or things of value, but it is the giving of the money or things of value, corruptly.

After an analysis of this testimony, under the statutes in the State of Wisconsin, or even under the common law, let me ask, Is it a violation of the statute to pay out money for political advertising in the newspapers, or for editorial support, or for lithographs, or for campaign material, or for telegraphing, or for telephoning, or for express charges, or for office expenses, including rent, or for the hire of clerks and assistants in the office, or men engaged in the canvass, or for the hiring of speakers or halls, or for rent, or music at political meetings, or for men to devote their time and efforts in cultivating sentiment throughout the State, or to pay workers at the polls? Is it an offense to employ conveyances and the services of men in getting out the voters? If so, refer me to the statute which defines the offense, or refer me to the principles of the common law in Wisconsin or elsewhere in the United States which makes such acts a corrupt practice. Is it an offense under the statutes of the State of Wisconsin to expend money for drinks and cigars given in a social way during the campaign? If so, point me to the statute or the rule of the common law which proscribes it. With all the vast amount of money which has been expended in this way in National, State, county, township, and municipal campaigns, tell me where any of these acts have been declared to be penal or to be a corrupt practice, unless there is some statute upon the subject.

But the distinguished Senators from Iowa and Kansas tell us that it is demoralizing, that it is corrupting, that its influence is bad upon the public morals, and to all of this I give assent; but is it not just a little bit strange, if these acts are a violation of the law of the land, that neither of the able Senators, with all of their diligence and study of this proposition, has been able to give to us a single reference to a single authority in the United States? They refer us to the declarations made by some Canadian and English judges, but it will be noted that in each of the cases to which they refer and where these acts were held to be penal and a corrupt practice it was because of the statutes which existed in the various Provinces of Canada or in the British Empire. I concede that the judges in those cases, in what are obiter dicta, tell us that bribery at the common law is an offense and will be sufficient to set aside an election. But they tell us that where treating is made an offense it must be to such an extent that it interferes with the freedom of elections. Nowhere do they say to us that the giving of a social drink or a social cigar shall be regarded as an act of corruption unless it is for the very purpose of changing or corrupting the vote.

I think I have shown that under the state of the law as it existed during this primary election no one of the several classes of expenditures could be regarded as an infraction of the law. The testimony shows that the practices which obtained in that election in the way of hiring employees, workers at the polls, and conveyances to get out the vote, or in the methods of advertising and electioneering, generally had obtained in that State for years. It is a matter of common knowledge that the same customs and practices prevail in most of the States. And it seems to me that if these are to be cut off, and for the most part they ought to be prohibited, it should be done by some statutory regulation. But we are told that if this kind of campaigning had been done in a reasonable way it would not have been a violation of the law; that the vice comes from the extent to which it was carried on. Let us examine this position.

The population of the States varies from 81,875 in Nevada to 9,113,279 in New York. If we are to say that the expenditure of $107,000 in the State of Wisconsin is an excessive amount, what shall be regarded as an excessive amount in the State of Nevada or in the State of New York? Where is the dividing line between what is reasonable and what is unreasonable, between what shall be considered incorrupt and what shall be regarded as corrupt? Where is the twilight zone, if there be any? Shall the amount of expenditures be limited to so much per State or to so much per voter? Shall it be limited to a given amount in a rural community and an entirely different amount in a municipality? Shall it be lawful to employ two men at one poll and unlawful to employ five at another? Shall it be a crime to have five teams at one poll and perfectly legitimate to have two at another? Is the law so uncertain a device that we must determine the legality or illegality by some particular standards which may be in the minds of men, and as different as there are different minds considering it?

One hundred dollars may be expended corruptly and $100,000 might be expended in a large State and not violate any law, either common or statutory. If a candidate were to offer a voter so much as a cigar in consideration that he vote for him, that would be corrupt and in violation of not only the statutes of the State of Wisconsin but of the common law as well. If he were to expend the $100,000 by employing speakers for public meetings, or to pay men who were to go throughout the State and create sentiment in his favor, or to employ men to go to the polls for the purpose of getting out the votes and hiring the necessary conveyances and for advertising, it would violate no principle of the common law, and as I construe the statute law of Wisconsin, it would not be violated.

It does not do to say that because a vast sum of money was expended therefore the vote or any part of it was purchased. If the contest was close between two given candidates, money might be expended corruptly, whether in small or in large sums. The amount which was expended is a circumstance to be taken into consideration in connection with all of the facts of the case and properly weighed, and from the whole testimony a conclusion must be reached and not from the one fact taken and construed by itself.

The common law consists of the principles laid down in adjudicated cases, or by recognized text writers, or it may be the customs and practices which are prevailing in a given community, which will control in the absence of any statutory regulation. And now the record shows that the practice of employing men and conveyances at the polls and of advertising and of treating prevailed in this State, and had prevailed there for years. The statute did not reach it, if I have properly construed it. Are these things now to be held for the first time a violation of the law without the intervention of any legislative action, either on the part of the general assembly of the State or of the Congress of the United States? I recognize it to be true that the authorities which the distinguished Senator from Iowa has referred to are to the effect that if the treating has been to the extent of interfering with a free election, then we ought to hold that improper methods had been used. But where is the testimony in this record or anywhere else which indicates that the treating had gone to such an extent?

The General Assembly of the State of Wisconsin must have recognized the fact that the bribery statutes which we have discussed, and which were in force at the time of the primary elections, were not sufficient to meet the situation presented in that primary, and they did not sufficiently curtail the expenditures either as to the kind or as to the amount. It is clear that in attempting to determine what a statute means we may look at the legislative history of the subject matter treated of. The general assembly in 1911 defined clearly the only disbursements which thereafter could be justified in an election.

Sections 94–96 (p. 885) provides:

1. No candidate shall make any disbursement for political purposes except:
(1) For his own personal hotel and traveling expenses and for postage, telegraph, and telephone expenses.
(2) For payments which he may make to the State pursuant to law.
(3) For contributions to his duly registered personal campaign committee.
(4) For contributions to his party committee.
(5) For the purposes enumerated in sections 94–97 of the statutes, when such candidate has no personal campaign committee, but not otherwise.
2. After the primary no candidate for election to the United States Senate shall make any disbursement in behalf of his candidacy, except contributions to his party committees, for his own actual necessary personal traveling expenses, and for postage, telephone, and telegraph expenses, and for payments which he may make to the State pursuant to law.

The next section, without taking the time of the Senate to read it, provides that the committee, or the candidate himself where he does not have a committee, may contract for advertisements in newspapers, periodicals, or magazines, but these, under a later section, must be marked as "paid advertisements"; he may employ and pay public speakers; and he may have men to travel throughout the State to circulate his campaign literature; or he may pay the traveling expenses of the members of his committee.

Clearly, now, since this act went into effect it would be illegal to employ men to attend the polls, or to hire conveyances to get out the vote, or to employ the editorial support of a newspaper, or for advertising which was not marked in the newspaper as a "paid advertisement." But shall we treat this matter now as if this statute had been in force, in 1908, at the time of the primary?

ARGUMENT OF THE JUNIOR SENATOR FROM IOWA.

The junior Senator from Iowa has, with a great deal of erudition, discussed the state of the common law as it existed in England, and quotes to some extent from Lord Coke's Institutes and from authorities on English and Canadian cases to establish his position that violations of the common law may be such as to invalidate an election in this country. It was not necessary to go to the archives of Great Britain or to go back to the time of the Roman Republic, as one of the Senators did, to show the evil effects of corrupt practices. But I was interested in the matter in the hope that some of the Senators might give us some American law upon this subject.

With the general principle for which the Senator contends I have no quarrel. But an examination of his authorities clearly shows that in order to invalidate an election the expenditures must be in the nature of a bribe—that is to say, a corrupt purchasing of votes—or it must be such as to interfere with the freedom of elections, or it must be an illegal expenditure of money, or an illegal practice. And I concede this proposition. But it is a long step from the act of hiring a man to devote his time and energies to the canvass in behalf of his principal to bribing a voter. It is a long step from the employment of a man to work at the polls and to bring in voters to the bribing or purchasing a voter. It is a long step from the employment of canvassers to go out through the State and create sentiment in favor of a candidate to an interference with the freedom of elections. It is a long step from the giving of a social drink or a cigar to the treating to such an extent as to interfere with the liberty of elections. The distance between the two classes of cases is measured by the distance between legal and illegal acts.

The Senator refers to the case of Sisson's petition against Ardagh, respondent, Hodgin's Election Cases, page 50, in which it was held that the hiring of a railway train to convey voters was a paying of the traveling expenses of the voters going to and from the election. But the court held this to be a corrupt practice, not under the common law, but under the provisions of section 71 of the Thirty-second Victoria. Was there any statute in Wisconsin at that time containing the same provisions as the Victoria statute?

Again, the Senator refers to the cases of Cameron, petitioner, v. McDougall, Hodgin's Cases, page 376, where the court held treating was not per se a corrupt act, except when made so by statute, but the intent of the party may make it so, and the intent must be judged by all the circumstances by which it is attended. But the acts in that case, without going into them in detail, were held not to be a corrupt practice. Was there any statute in Wisconsin at that time or any Federal statute or any principle of the common law which prevented treating? Of course, if the treating was done as a consideration for the votes that would be a corrupt practice; and if it were shown to exist, it would invalidate this election. But the testimony does not show that any of the treating which was done was done for this purpose. It was done in a social way, while they were attempting to create Stephenson sentiment. Are we to give a criminal tinge to everything that was done in this campaign? We must if the facts justify it. But we must not if the facts do not justify it.

Again, the Senator refers to the case of Cameron v. McLennon, Hodgin's Election Cases, 584, on the subject of treating. The court said:

If the treating were to such an extent as to amount to bribery, and the undue influence was of a character to affect the whole election, without referring to any statutory provisions, it would by the law of Parliament, we apprehend, influence the result.

Now, if I may take the time of the Senate to read just a paragraph, on this subject, from this same work, page 384, speaking of treating:

The general practice which prevails here amongst classes of persons, many of whom are voters, of drinking in a friendly way when they meet, would require strong evidence of a very profuse expenditure of money in drinking to induce a judge to say that it was corruptly done, so as to make it bribery or come within the meaning of "treating" as a corrupt practice at the common law.

But my friend will have to go from the realm of fact to the region of imagination before he can come to the conclusion that the treating went to the extent that it interfered with the freedom of the election in any of the 2,200 precincts of the State of Wisconsin.

Again he quotes:

The first principle of parliamentary law, as applicable to elections, is that they must be free. If treating and undue influence were carried to an extent to render the election not free, then the election would be void.

But this begs the whole question. It must appear in the light of this authority that, before the Senator from Wisconsin could be held to be guilty of bribery, the treating was carried on to such an extent as to amount to bribery and undue influence. I submit that a fair investigation of the record will fail to show that such was the case. We may infer fraud or corrupt practices from acts proven, but it is a general and fundamental principle of law that where a given act is susceptible of two constructions—the one lawful and the other unlawful—it is both the duty of the jury and of the judge to give it the sanction of law rather than to hold it to be a violation of the law.

Again, he quotes from Cushing on the Law of Legislative Assemblies, in part as follows:

> Freedom of election is violated by external violence, by which the electors are constrained, or by bribery, by which their will is corrupted; and in all cases where the electors are prevented in either of these ways from the free exercise of their rights the election will be void without reference to the number of votes thereby affected.

We concede that there must be freedom of elections; that there must not be violence; that there must not be bribery or corruption; but we insist that there is no proof that any of these acts existed.

The Senator then quotes extensively from Sheppard on Elections, and Rogers on Elections. Without intending to discuss these authorities in extenso, it is sufficient for my purpose to say that bribery is an offense at the common law as well as by statute. No criminal prosecutions were begun under the English common law, where its provisions were violated, but if there was in fact bribery it would vitiate the election. I do not deny these propositions. But where, in all this record of testimony, is there a word showing that there was corruption, or that there was bribery?

Again, the Senator quotes from Sisson's petition against Ardagh in Hodgin's Election Cases, page 58. This was a prosecution for the violation of a statute. It was charged that Mr. Lauder has intrusted $700 to his agent, Perry; that Lauder should have supervised the expenditures. The court held that there was no evidence that the expenditures were excessive, and then suggests that if it had been $7,000 the argument of corrupt practices might have been reasonable. But the court adds:

> The facts do not suggest to my mind any idea that Mr. Lauder intended his money to be employed illegally.

And this is quite significant when we bear in mind that the record shows that repeatedly Senator STEPHENSON had cautioned his managers to keep within the law.

And now, while the distinguished Senator from Iowa has been somewhat prolific in his citation of English and Canadian authorities to establish a general principle, and when we remember that the practices, of employing men to aid in creating sentiment in behalf of candidates, of hiring of assistants at the polls, of advertising in the public prints, and of treating in a social way, have prevailed in this country for almost time out of mind, is it not a little strange that, with all his diligence, he has not been able to refer us to a single American case in any National, State, county, or municipal election which will sustain his position that the practices which prevailed in Wisconsin are a violation of any known law?

SENATOR BRISTOW'S ARGUMENT.

The junior Senator from Kansas, judging from the very able speech which he delivered in the Senate on this subject in favor of unseating the Senator from Wisconsin, has shown the diligence which is so characteristic of him in searching records and collecting testimony. I do not believe that any Senator will be able to go through the record and present a stronger brief of the facts against the validity of Senator STEPHENSON'S title to his seat than that to which we listened for two days while the distinguished Senator from Kansas was arguing the case.

I shall not attempt to retrace his steps in detail, but in order that I may make my position clear it is my desire to call attention to the salient features of his argument.

Briefly stated, Senator STEPHENSON expended $107,793.05. For the most part it was placed in the control of his campaign managers, Messrs. Edmunds, Sackett, and Puelicher. The account of receipts and disbursements by Puelicher, who was a banker and was acting as treasurer, differed materially from the account of any other customer of the bank. Sackett kept a memorandum of the disbursements on cards. Later he made transcripts from the cards and destroyed the cards, but there is no evidence tending to show that Mr. STEPHENSON knew of the methods of either of these gentlemen. Reynolds, Bancroft, and Wellensgard were candidates for the general assembly. None of them lived in Senator STEPHENSON'S district. Under the statute of that State he was forbidden to give any money or thing of value in procuring or aiding to procure the nomination or election of any person to the general assembly.

The testimony shows that Senator STEPHENSON and his committee had placed in the hands of these three men certain funds, not to be used in securing their nomination, but to be used by them for the purpose of aiding Senator STEPHENSON in his own campaign. These men had all been members of the general assembly; previously were Senator STEPHENSON'S friends; had voted for him when he was a candidate for election to the United States Senate in 1907; and they say that they used none of this money for their own campaign. I know that this testimony is open to the suspicion that these men may have used this money for their own interest or that Senator STEPHENSON may have given it for that particular purpose. But who can fairly examine this record and say that the preponderance of the proof indicates that it was used in any unlawful way? To place the construction upon it that it was used for this unlawful purpose is not only to deny the words of all of the witnesses themselves, but it is to give no effect to the spirit of their former friendship. Must we presume fraud to exist where none is proven? Are we to conclude that because wicked men do unlawful things and attempt to conceal them, therefore these legislators are precluded from denying wrongdoing?

I realize that the Senator's construction of this evidence may be right, but the probabilities, in my judgment, are all against his contention when we apply to it the rules by which testimony is usually weighed. Are these men not to be believed? I think I speak for every Member who sat in these hearings when I say that there was no evidence which came to us to indicate that these three representatives were not average men, with average character, and with average reputation for truth, veracity, and honesty.

SUPPORT OF NEWSPAPERS.

The Senator from Kansas devoted a good deal of time to an analysis of the testimony bearing upon the payment for advertising and editorial support in certain newspapers. His position is that an arrangement for advertising or newspaper support—> was a bribe, a corrupt act, and just as heinous as if it had been the purchase of the vote of a member of the legislature.

but the General Assembly of Wisconsin by a formal act has since provided for paid advertisements. Briefly stated, the record shows that Mr. Dee——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. Suppose the Legislature of Wisconsin had provided a man might buy a member of the legislature, would that make it justifiable?

Mr. POMERENE. Absolutely not.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then suppose it provided he could buy the editorial support of a newspaper, does the Senator say it follows that it makes it a legitimate transaction?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not quite understand the distinguished Senator's code of political morals. If that is an offense, I am afraid nearly every candidate he has supported for any national office has been guilty of a violation of the moral code.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is, the Senator thinks that nearly every candidate goes out and buys the support of newspapers.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understood the Senator——

Mr. POMERENE. I did not.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understood it to be at least an inference from the Senator's remarks.

Mr. POMERENE. I mean to say that many of the candidates do go out and pay for political advertising, and that has prevailed to such an extent that while I think the practice ought to be abolished, yet it is within the province of the legislatures or of Congress to regulate these things.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator now says political advertising. The quotation he read from the remarks of the Senator from Kansas referred to the purchase of the editorial support of newspapers.

Mr. POMERENE. I think, Mr. President, with all due respect to the Senator from Kansas, that he has misconstrued this testimony, and I will refer to the facts, if the Senator will permit me, as I go along. It was not a buying of editorial support.

Briefly stated, the record shows that Mr. Dee entered into a contract for newspaper advertising for which he received a consideration of $150.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. LEA. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to state that there was no purchase of editorial support in that campaign by Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. POMERENE. None by Senator STEPHENSON.

Mr. LEA. Or by his managers?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not say——

Mr. LEA. Managers acting for him?

Mr. POMERENE. I do recall now one man who was a friend of Senator STEPHENSON who conducted a paper and had conducted it editorially in his behalf, and he was seen by one of his managers, and they provided for some advertising space and urged him to be a little more active in his columns.

Mr. LEA. How does the Senator characterize the transaction of Mr. Dee, who was the editor of the Chippewa Herald? Mr. Dee was formerly the county manager of that county for Mr. Hatton. He received a contract for $170 worth of advertising, without any limitaton as to the amount of advertising or the amount of space to be used, and thereafter he discontinued his support of Mr. Hatton. It is true that he said he had mentally determined two weeks prior to that not to support Mr. Hatton, but the first evidence we have of it is subsequent to the contract for this so-called advertising. Does not the Senator regard that as the purchase of editorial support?

Mr. POMERENE. If I remember the facts in that behalf, I do not think the Senator has fully or fairly stated them. I may be wrong, but my recollection is that this witness testified that something had appeared in the columns of his paper in support of some other candidate without his knowledge. That was some time before the contract was made. But to continue with Mr. Dee's testimony. The record shows that he was to use such material as he saw fit and in the way that he saw fit, and was to use as much space as he could for that amount of money; that he later received $200, and he, at least, says that a part of this was used for the purpose of employing workers at the polls. If it comes to the question as to whether or not the purchase of advertising space or even of editorial support is a matter of good taste and good political morals, the question must be answered in the negative. And if the question is as to whether or not such purchasing constitutes a violation of the law, statutory or common, it must also be answered in the negative.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. KERN. I desire to inquire as to whether this witness Mr. Dee did not expressly declare that the advertising referred to was editorial matter, and that nothing in the form of advertising, using the word in the usual acceptation of the term, appears at all?

Mr. POMERENE. My recollection is at variance with the Senator's on that subject.

Mr. KERN. I will ask the Senator, further, whether the fact in a nutshell about it is not about as follows: That on a day certain he supported another candidate in his paper; that on the day following he was given a sum of money; and that a week thereafter he was supporting STEPHENSON. I ask the Senator whether or not that is not the chronological order of Mr. Dee's action.

Mr. POMERENE. Possibly when I answered the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] I had not in mind the facts relating to Mr. Dee. In any event one of the witnesses testified that something had appeared in his paper a week or two before inadvertently and when he was away. But that does not answer the point which I made.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. LEA. Was it not the fact that Editor Dee was the manager for Hatton of that particular county a short time prior to the visit of the Stephenson manager, with whom he made a contract for the so-called advertising?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not recall that fact. I have no memory on the subject at this moment. But I concede that it is not a matter of good morals to buy editorial support. There may be a difference of taste. My judgment is that it is bad taste to do it. I think that it ought to be prevented; but it seems to me that if there is any law preventing this class of work I am sure that the very able Senator from Indiana will be able to point it out.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. KERN. Do I understand the Senator's attitude to be that if there is no law forbidding an immoral thing, therefore it is justifiable?

Mr. POMERENE. I have labored in vain if I have not made myself clear that the seat of any Senator may be vacated where there are corrupt practices, whether they be corrupt under the principles of the statutory law or under the well-known principles of the common law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to suggest merely that the question here is not whether the seat shall be vacated. The question here is as to whether a man was elected.

Mr. POMERENE. I have inaptly used the wrong word, but I apply it either to the proposition of vacating his seat or to the determination of the question as to whether or not his election to this seat was by corrupt or improper practices. I do not believe that there is any Federal statute or any State statute or any principle of the common law which makes it a corrupt practice to employ newspaper support, either by way of editorial or advertisement. That it should be regulated by law I concede. It has not been regarded as an offense of any kind, notwithstanding the opinion of the Senator from Kansas. That it is not a bribe or a corrupt practice clearly appears from the fact that the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin in the spring of 1911 (Wisconsin Laws, p. 886) passed a law permitting disbursements "for campaign advertising in newspapers, periodicals, or magazines as provided in this act," but the statute requires that before the newspaper can receive payment therefor it must be designated as "paid advertisement." (Wisconsin Session Laws. 1911, p. 890.) That expenditures of this kind should be regulated and controlled by law I do not doubt; that they were not so controlled by either statute or the common law is equally clear. Must we, then, because we think this practice has been abused, judge of this case as if there was a law on the statute books at the time of the election which has been violated?

Mr. LEA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. LEA. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator, but he characterized my comment on the testimony of Dee as unfair. I merely desire to show that my comment on the testimony of Mr. Dee was fair. On page 1224 of the record Senator POMERENE asked Mr. Dee the following questions:

> Prior to that time had you supported any of the other candidates for the senatorship?
> Mr. DEE. No, sir.
> Senator POMERENE. None of them, editorially?
> Mr. DEE. No, sir.
> Senator POMERENE. Mr. Hatton or Mr. McGovern?
> Mr. DEE. I was originally appointed Hatton's manager for Chippewa County, but I withdrew from that, and notified them very clearly and without equivocation that I would withdraw from Mr. Hatton's support.
> Senator POMERENE. What time did you withdraw?
> Mr. DEE. It was some time in July, if I remember correctly.
> Senator POMERENE. How long before you made your arrangement with Mr. Ring?
> Mr. DEE. It must have been a couple of weeks anyway.

The point I desired to make was that one of the editors of the papers who received this so-called advertising from Senator STEPHENSON'S manager was originally a Hatton supporter; that is, a supporter of another candidate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in order that we may be able to give full force to the testimony of the witness quoted, it would only be fair to have the whole of it in the RECORD; and it seems to me, assuming the naked facts to be just as they have been read—and I acquit the Senator from any intentional misrepresentation of the record; he certainly would not do that—simply because of the fact that an editor may have favored one man at one stage of the campaign and another man at another stage of the campaign, are we justified in coming to the conclusion that he did so because of a corrupt motive?

C. C. WAYLAND'S TESTIMONY.

The junior Senator from Kansas discusses at considerable length the testimony of C. C. Wayland, who was one of the active organizers in behalf of Senator STEPHENSON. In substance, he testifies that he selected men who were for Senator STEPHENSON from among the Belgians, Germans, Hollanders, Methodists, Catholics, and Lutherans, paid them from $2 to $5 per day for their services in helping to get out the vote, furnished cigars to men in the country, paid for drinks and cigars in the saloons, and finally was requested by Mr. Edmunds to discontinue treating. He paid for stenographers, canvassers, livery hire for the primaries and trips before the primaries, treats, etc., during the entire campaign $1,199.34, and this included probably $300 for his own services.

The Senator then jumps to the conclusion that this was a corrupt and improper use of money for influencing men in election. If so, how corrupt? What principle of law had been violated? How was it improper? By what standards, legal or illegal, moral or immoral? What method of expenditure was adopted here which has not prevailed in every national, State, county, township, and municipal campaign? Should these expenditures be forbidden? Yes. Were they forbidden at that time? No. Why were they not forbidden by some law, either legislative or congressional? This has not been a new practice. It has obtained for years.

My regret is twofold: First, that this method of campaigning has ever obtained in this country; and, secondly, that the legislative authorities have not seen fit heretofore to have placed a check upon it.

After discussing at some length the testimony of Mr. Wayland, the junior Senator from Kansas says:

It is easily seen that Mr. Wayland hired men who were susceptible to influence.

Mr. Edmonds and other witnesses before the committee said that this method of campaigning had obtained for years in that State. Mr. Wayland had simply resorted to the methods which were then in vogue. He states that he first inquired as to whether or not these men were favorable to STEPHENSON, and then employed them. By what rule of fairness in the weighing of a man's words have we the right to come to the conclusion that these men who were thus employed were susceptible to the influence of the money which they may have received? I recognize the fact that it is a dangerous practice, and that to permit the use of money in this way is to leave the door open to the commission of fraud. But so long as it is not proven that fraud was committed, either by direct or indirect testimony, or by a reasonable inference from the facts proven, it is not our right to say that because there was a possibility of fraud, therefore fraud was committed. It does not do to say that because money was given to pay a man for his effort and for his time that it, in fact, was used under this cloak for the purpose of buying votes, unless the proof justifies it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not quite understand the application of the remark made by the Senator from Ohio a few moments ago, and in order to get his view upon the question I recall to his attention the somewhat famous Caldwell case. Caldwell paid Carney $15,000 for withdrawing as a candidate for the Senate of the United States before the Legislature of Kansas. There was no law of Kansas against a payment of that sort, nor is there now, as I understand; there was no law of Congress against that payment then, nor is there now. Does the Senator from Ohio believe that, therefore, the election which followed was an honest election?

Mr. POMERENE. Undoubtedly it was not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why was it otherwise, if there was no law either of the State or of Congress, and even no law now upon a transaction of that sort? Where did the Senate get its right—its moral right—to unseat Mr. Caldwell, as it would have unseated him if he had not resigned?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I thought I had labored very industriously to explain my position to the Senate to be this: That there could be a corrupt practice by virtue of a statute, State or National, or there might be a corrupt practice under the well-known principles of the common law. The contract which was made in the case to which the distinguished Senator from Iowa refers was a contract by which, for a consideration of money, Carney agreed to withdraw from the race, and, as I remember it, to deliver his votes, or at least his influence, to Caldwell.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Ohio is wrong about the last. That was simply an inference.

Mr. POMERENE. Assuming that I am wrong about that, he at least attempted to deliver those votes. It was a contract clearly in violation of every principle of political morality, and for that reason the Senate would have fallen short of its duty if it had failed to unseat the Member.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator think that that transaction violated the rules of political morality more than would an agreement between a candidate and the editor of a newspaper that, for a consideration, the editor of the newspaper would support the candidate editorially?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the question is a very interesting one as a matter of ethics, but in the Kansas case, to which the Senator has referred, the principles of the common law, based upon precedent, made the transaction illegal. If the Senator can refer to any principle either of statutory or of common law which makes it a corrupt practice to buy or employ editorial space in a paper, then his position may be well taken.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not remember any instance like the Caldwell case that ever arose under the common law or that was ever adjudged under the common law. It was immoral because it shocked and violated the civilized, decent sense of that time. I believe that the purchase of an editorial opinion contravenes and shocks the political and moral sense of this time as completely as did the transaction in Kansas violate the ideas of that time. I want, however, to make one distinction. I recognize that a candidate for an office, if he desires to do so, can advertise in a newspaper; I think that is perfectly legitimate; but it must appear in the newspaper as an advertisement, and not as the expression of the opinion of the editor of the newspaper that the particular candidate should be elected, when in fact it is not the opinion of the editor that the candidate should be elected. I am not entering upon a discussion of the facts. I was simply wanting to be put right with regard to the law which had been applied by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator and I have no difference of opinion as to what the law ought to be. As these practices are permitted to grow up, they ought to be changed, and they ought to be changed by the legislative bodies of the country. For instance, to use another illustration, it is against the principles of the common law that there should be rebating. Would the Senator indict a man for rebating, convict him, and assess a fine against him before there was any law on the subject on the statute books?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is well known, I suppose, that in our country an indictment is based upon statute law, at least that is the case so far as my own State is concerned; but I say at once, in order to make the instance parallel with the one that we are now considering, that if a contract were entered into providing for a rebate which would be a discrimination among the patrons of a railway company, no title could be conferred on anyone through a contract of that sort any more than title to a seat in this body can be acquired through the violation of the accepted rules of conduct which we endeavor to apply in the affairs of life.

Mr. POMERENE. The contract would certainly be void, there can be no question about that; but at the same time, could the principle be extended to the point where a Member should be unseated when he has done nothing which is a violation of any of these principles, as I conceive them to be? It may be that the Senator and I differ as to what the real facts are in this case. I think that perhaps whatever difference of opinion there is between us arises out of the difference in the construction of the testimony rather than a difference in the construction of the law as it is or of the law as it ought to be.

SOL L. PERRIN'S TESTIMONY.

The junior Senator from Kansas discussed at great length the testimony of Sol L. Perrin. He was a lawyer and had been given $5,000 with which to take charge of the campaign in a number of counties in his section of the State. He attempts to account for this money by saying, in substance, that he gave it to a number of men who were to use it in their several localities in employing men to talk in behalf of Senator STEPHENSON, and to create sentiment in favor of his election, and for the purpose of employing workers at the polls in the different precincts and counties under its charge. And while, as I recall, he gives the names of the men whom he had in charge of the several counties, he says he can not give the names of the workers he employed, and his account of the administration of this fund is very unsatisfactory. There is no evidence, as I now recall, that Senator STEPHENSON had anything to do with his employment except as he did it through Mr. Edmonds. Because he does not give a satisfactory account of what he did with the $5,000 which was turned over to him, the inference is drawn by the Senator from Kansas that this was a corruption fund contributed by the Senator from Wisconsin and that it was used for the purchase of votes or, in any event, for the corruption of the electorate.

Senator STEPHENSON has said repeatedly that when he started out in the organization of this campaign he cautioned his managers to keep within the law. He was an old man, of great business cares. He gave little, if any, attention to the campaign, and in his failure to so do he was at fault. But, in my judgment, instead of charging that this money was corruptly employed in the corruption of the electorate of the State of Wisconsin, we would come as near to the truth if we were to say that a greater part of this money never left the hands of those who received it. Other men similarly failed to account for the funds which they had received, but in the explanation of the expenditures of these funds it seems to me that we can, with greater propriety and with more logic, come to the conclusion that much of the money was not expended at all by the men who received it, than to say that the money was corruptly used for the purpose of debauching the voters of the State. The failure of some of the men to properly account for their disbursements is referable rather to the fact that they did not disburse it than to the fact that it was disbursed illegally by Senator STEPHENSON or his authorized agents.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio what, in his opinion, the money was given to these men for? Take the game warden, Mr. Stone; what was he given $2,500 for?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I will not take the time of the Senate to go into the full details, but will content myself with saying this: The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], in discussing that testimony, quoted from the record a single sentence, which was to the effect that it was given to him for "his assistance in the campaign." It is unfair to take a few words from the context and place a construction upon the conduct of the parties involved without giving due weight to the whole testimony upon that subject. The record clearly shows that whatever money was given to Stone was for the purpose of organization. He distributed a large part of it among his deputies and some of it he failed to account for, and even went to the extent of perjuring himself before the legislative committee in order to cover up the fact that he had not used the money, but kept part of it for himself. Mr. Stone testified and others testified that this money was given to him to be used in organization throughout the State, but specific instructions were not given, as I remember.

Mr. BRISTOW. And no accounting was asked for.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is true.

Mr. BRISTOW. What does the Senator understand was meant by the "organization" which Mr. Stone would perfect?

Mr. POMERENE. The record shows that what was meant by Mr. Edmonds and others who had charge of this campaign was that men should go out and talk in behalf of Mr. STEPHENSON, should circulate his literature, should employ men at the polls, should hire conveyances, and that the money was to be expended in those and kindred ways.

Mr. BRISTOW. Suppose Mr. Stone concluded from these general instructions that this $2,500 was given him for the purpose of inducing him to go out and talk for STEPHENSON. That $2,500 was expended, then, in order to secure the influence of Stone, presumably because he would not have been for him unless he had received the $2 500. Does the Senator think that is a legitimate political method?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not think the Senator is justified in drawing that inference from the testimony, and when I speak of the testimony I mean the whole testimony upon that subject. I do not think that the money was a quid pro quo for his support.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I simply wanted to inquire if Mr. Stone was not told to keep within the law?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not think there is any such testimony in the record. I recognize the fact that in this record Senator STEPHENSON several times said that he had so cautioned his managers. I suspect that the fact that he gave that caution has had great influence with the Senator from Iowa in making up his mind as to what position he should take in this matter. If Mr. STEPHENSON had said nothing upon the subject, I suspect that he would have been condemned with the same force.

This is one of the circumstances connected with the case. If Senator STEPHENSON had been shown to be guilty of the improper practices which are charged to his account, perhaps we could give but little force to these words. But we must remember that here was a man four-score years of age and more, who at least did not have the physical ability to attend to the details of this campaign. He called in a few of his friends, and they discussed the methods of the campaign, and as a parting word he said, "Now, boys, keep within the law." I do not think it is very much to his discredit to have said that, nor do I believe it to be an indicium of criminality.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] asked the Senator from Ohio whether or not Mr. STEPHENSON had directed Stone to keep within the law. It seems to have been assumed all the way through this debate that Mr. STEPHENSON paid this $2,500, or directed it to be paid, to Mr. Stone. In truth and in fact there is no such evidence. The testimony is to the contrary—that Mr. STEPHENSON neither directed nor authorized it to be paid. So there was no occasion for his directing Mr. Stone to keep within the law—that is, there was no occasion for his personally making that statement to Mr. Stone.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. STEPHENSON had full knowledge of the matter, did he not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Full knowledge of what?

Mr. KENYON. Of the payment of the $2,500.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is no evidence in the record that he knew anything about it until it was all over.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator state that no part of it, as shown in this record, was paid by Mr. STEPHENSON?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I say positively that there is no evidence that any part of the $2,500 was paid by Mr. STEPHENSON.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator may be correct.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Nor is there any evidence that it was directed to be paid by him, although the contrary has been stated and is assumed in the minority views.

Mr. POMERENE. It was paid by his managers.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It was paid by Mr. Edmonds.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, much note has been made of the fact that an account of the expenditures was not filed, as required by the statutes of the State of Wisconsin. The account which was filed certainly did not comply with the law, but the testimony shows that the managers of the campaign kept certain accounts; that they filed a statement of the expenditures in conformity with what had been the practice in that State and in conformity with a form which had been used by a judge of the supreme court, among other prominent officials; and that before the statement was filed it was submitted to Senator STEPHENSON'S lawyers. They approved it, and whatever moral delinquency there may be in not complying with the strict letter of the law is theirs, and not his, though he would be amenable to the criminal penalty.

Mr. President, I have already detained the Senate too long, and I must conclude. All will agree that the disbursements in this campaign were extravagant, and they ought to have been prohibited. They were of the same kind and character as have been made for almost time of out mind in campaigns, local, State, and National. In my judgment there is no evidence of any corruption, either by Senator STEPHENSON himself, or by others with his sanction or authority, direct or indirect. Congress and the State legislature have permitted this kind of campaigning to continue without any attempt to correct it by law, and now public policy requires that new laws shall be enacted; but the same public policy requires that the Senator from Wisconsin shall be tried in accordance with the law as it was at the time of the acts complained of. Are we to wreak vengeance, after generations of this method of campaigning, upon the head of one man, simply because the legislative bodies of the State and of the Nation have failed to enact much-needed legislation? I can not do it by my vote, under the proof as I see it, and under the law as I understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. HEYBURN. There is a substitute pending, offered by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS].

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. WORKS. The substitute was not offered.

Mr. HEYBURN. I find it on my desk; that is all.

Mr. WORKS. It was simply presented with a view of offering it at a later time; but, in view of the vote already taken, I will not press it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course it will have to be offered and voted upon before the main question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from California says he will not offer it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that it is not to be considered, then.

Mr. President, certain Senators, whom I do not now see in the Chamber, have indicated their intention to address the Senate upon this motion. I think it is hardly fair to them to foreclose them from the debate in which they expected to participate. I notice on one of the desks, at least, some evidence of the intention of the occupant of that desk to make some remarks. I would inquire whether those Senators desire to address the Senate before a vote is taken.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I suggest to the Senator that if he will call attention to the fact that a quorum is not present, that will summon those Senators here.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator has already done that. The mere whisper of that in the Chamber requires a roll call.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not have to yield, because the suggestion is made of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hoped that suggestion would not be made——

Mr. HEYBURN. It can not be withdrawn.

Mr. CUMMINS. Because possibly I can take up the time as well with a few remarks as by a call of the roll.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is one of those unfortunate things that sometimes happens that when any Senator suggests the absence of a quorum the roll must be called, and it can not be withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that the Senator from Nevada suggested the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HEYBURN. He did suggest it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I suggested that the Senator from Idaho should suggest it.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is only the form of language in which attention was called to the fact.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Curtis	McCumber	Simmons
Borah	Dillingham	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Bourne	du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Bradley	Fletcher	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Foster	Nixon	Smoot
Briggs	Gamble	O'Gorman	Stephenson
Bristow	Gardner	Overman	Stone
Brown	Gronna	Page	Sutherland
Bryan	Heyburn	Percy	Townsend
Burnham	Johnson, Me.	Perkins	Warren
Burton	Johnston, Ala.	Poindexter	Watson
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Pomerene	Wetmore
Chilton	Lea	Rayner	Williams
Clapp	Lippitt	Richardson	Works
Crane	Lodge	Root
Cummins	Lorimer	Shively

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] was appointed by the Senate a member of the committee to attend the funeral of the late Gen. Bingham, and he has not yet returned to the Senate.

Mr. BURNHAM. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is necessarily absent.

Mr. STONE. My colleague [Mr. REED] is absent on important business, and is paired, I understand, with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon the roll call, 62 Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if there were nothing more than a question of fact before the Senate, I would content myself with recording my conviction upon the controversy by my vote and I would not detain the Senate by observations upon the case. There is, however, more than a question of fact at issue. Repeating, with slight paraphrase, the most serious and the most impressive utterance I ever heard in debate, I fear that the Senate is about to commit a grave mistake. I fear that the Senate is about to inflict all the injury that it can inflict upon the modern policy of nominating candidates for the Senate of the United States at a primary or popular election.

Some Senators here who have joined in the majority report openly and frankly avow that purpose. Other Senators, it seems to me, will lend the weight of their influence to the same result unintentionally and unconsciously. If the Senate declares that a candidate for the Senate of the United States can corrupt the primary election in which he is seeking a nomination and still hold a good title to his seat, then primary elections for the nominations of candidates for the Senate will become dangerous instrumentalities instead of an honest expression of the public will. This is one of the issues we must now determine.

When we say that the corruption of a primary has no effect upon the particular Senator elected by a legislature in obedience to the primary expression, or when we say that in order to establish the corruption of the primary we must prove that enough individual voters were corrupted in order to change the results, then we have simply turned the power of money free, untrammeled, and unrestricted upon the electorate of the United States.

It is, as I view it, the gravest question that has yet appeared at the bar of the Senate. The Senate has never before been compelled to decide the questions which now confront it. A case of this character has never before arisen in this body. It presents to us in another form the new movement among the people of the United States—the new method of nominating candidates for office. It is for us to say whether the same safeguards are required to be thrown around the new plan that we have so long recognized as applicable to the old methods.

The senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], who is in charge of this measure or this resolution, believes, and I have no doubt he believes honestly, that a primary election for the selection of a candidate for the Senate of the United States is not only unconstitutional but is vicious. He intends to draw as many Senators after him as he can in order to disparage and discredit throughout the United States the policy of allowing the voters of a political party to select their candidates for the Senate of the United States, and he intends to do it by having the Senate declare, if he can, that no matter how completely and comprehensively the primary election may be corrupted, nevertheless the title conferred upon the man who is elected by the legislature of the State is without a stain.

I think it is due to the country that those Senators who may inferentially stand with the senior Senator from Idaho upon this most extraordinary proposition shall be heard before we close this debate, for I am curious to know how many men there are in this country who espouse a doctrine so full of menace, so destructive to peace and good order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator unnecessarily. I would apply the Senator's last remark to the proposition whether a majority or a minority of the people should direct the rule of this Government. I regard the Senator's position with reference to a direct primary, the manner in which he demands that it shall be recognized and that the rule that shall be applied to it, as I would regard a proposition to provide for the manner in which a prize fight should be conducted, and I give it no more dignity. I regard the direct primary as a violation of the law, as a violation of the fundamental principles of our Government, as an attempt to anticipate something that we have not yet concluded to do. I will be perfectly candid about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I compliment the Senator from Idaho upon his candor and his frankness. I understood his sentiments before, and I think it is greatly to his credit that he has the courage to avow them. But I should like to know how many other Senators there are here who have joined in the majority report who hold similar views with regard to a primary election for the selection of a candidate for the Senate. This is one of the most extraordinary occasions which will ever confront the Senate of the United States. I believe that this day will be long remembered by not only Senators but by the people throughout the country, if it is understood that a vote in harmony with the senior Senator from Idaho means what he declares his vote will mean upon the resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has stated that the motion now pending before the Senate is on the adoption of the report of the committee, which was written by the senior Senator from Idaho. Does the Senator contend that if this motion carries it is an indorsement by the Senate of the views of the senior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want, Mr. President, to do anybody an injustice. The sentiments which I have just mentioned and which the senior Senator from Idaho has avowed are contained in the views of the senior Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. But not in the report.

Mr. CUMMINS. And not in the report; and they have been reiterated many times from his place on the floor. I do not know how many of the Senators who joined with the senior Senator from Idaho in the majority report hold like views. It may be inferred that all of them do except the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], who have taken care to distinguish themselves from the main body of the majority by insisting that they are not in harmony with the principle which has thus been announced by the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. LEA. In reference to the inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], we were under the impression that the question before the Senate is on the substitute offered by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS].

Mr. HEYBURN. That has been withdrawn.

Mr. WORKS. It has not been withdrawn; it was not formally offered.

Mr. LEA. It has been withdrawn?

Mr. OVERMAN. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]:

I move that the report of the committee be adopted and that ISAAC STEPHENSON be declared entitled to a seat as Senator from the State of Wisconsin in the United States Senate.

The pending motion is a motion that the report of the committee be adopted.

Mr. HEYBURN. That has nothing at all to do with the expression of the individual views by members of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. However, I think the burden of proof is upon the remaining members of the majority to deliver themselves from this doctrine which is espoused and announced by the senior Senator from Idaho or to make it known that they are in harmony with it, because the senior Senator from Idaho was the chairman of the subcommittee, he made the report to the full committee, and the full committee adopted the report which he made for the exculpation of the Senator from Wisconsin. Then the senior Senator from Idaho proceeded to express his views more at length upon the subject, and I must infer, until it is otherwise declared, that his fellow members of the committee, with the exception of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] hold like views; and if they do not they owe it, as it seems to me, to their country as well as to the Senate to make themselves understood with respect to so vital a proposition.

It rather extends my remarks to be compelled to distinguish between the two great Senators from Idaho with every sentence. Here sits the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the author of one of the most powerful and impressive speeches I ever heard, delivered yesterday, with which I concur not only in conclusion but in every detail. Here sits the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], with whose views upon this question I differ in every detail. I think I may shorten my discussion by now saying that when I refer to the Senator from Idaho as I go forward I mean the senior Senator from Idaho. That will avoid the necessity of making this discrimination in every sentence.

The Senator from Idaho is a courageous man. I agree to that; and I like courage even when it is misdirected, as I believe it is in this instance. But if the Senator from Idaho were as logical as he is brave he would not have presented the resolution which is now before the Senate, and for which it is manifest he intends to vote. I can demonstrate that so that his comprehensive mind will not only appreciate it and understand it but will admit it, I think.

The Senator from Idaho holds that a primary election for the nomination of a party candidate for Senator of the United States is unconstitutional. Not only so, but he holds that it is vicious, and by that I assume that he means at least immoral as tested by our duty prescribed in the Constitution. The Senator from Idaho knows that Mr. STEPHENSON was elected by the Legislature of Wisconsin because—and only because—he was selected for that office, as he declares, in an unconstitutional and vicious way. What influenced the members of the legislature to vote for the sitting Member? The influence was the act of the voters of the Republican Party in Wisconsin, and the Senator from Idaho says this act was a vicious act. I suppose he would apply every adjective that his fertile vocabulary could suggest in order to describe the act. If that is true, then Mr. STEPHENSON has no title to the seat he holds, because he was elected by men who were improperly and viciously influenced to do the thing which they did.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not imagine that I stand here with my mind filled with vicious adjectives——

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. To be used for the purpose of describing these men. I do not. For whom should the Legislature of Wisconsin have voted for United States Senator? The Senator is familiar with the record; he knows the proceeding. For whom should the Republican members of the legislature in Wisconsin have voted, and for whom would the Senator have voted had he been in the legislature? It was their duty to vote for somebody. Now, for whom should they have voted?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that gives me the very opportunity that I feared would not come to express my view of that matter. If I had been a member of the Legislature of Wisconsin, and if I had believed that the primary election was honestly conducted—had not been corrupted—I would have voted for Mr. STEPHENSON.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, wait a moment. Do not interrupt me until I have completely finished.

Mr. HEYBURN. All right.

Mr. CUMMINS. Because I will give the Senator from Idaho something to say about that as a text in a moment. If the Senator from Idaho had been a member of the Legislature of Wisconsin, and if he had believed then, as he appears to believe now, that a primary election for that purpose is unconstitutional, and is not only unconstitutional, but is vicious——

Mr. HEYBURN. Say without warrant of law.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator used the word unconstitutional. I am simply following his phraseology. If he had believed that the law was unconstitutional and the law was wrong and vicious and if he had voted for any candidate on account of that law, would his vote have been an honest or a dishonest vote?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a very vain imagination. I would have been influenced in no degree whatever by this straw vote which you call a primary.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well——

Mr. HEYBURN. Nor had I been a candidate would I have wanted the support of any man who would be governed or influenced by it; and my record will bear me out in that statement.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not familiar with the Senator's record in that respect, and it is not material to me anyhow. I do not care anything about his record in so far as that goes, because I know him to be unflinching and unrelenting in opposition to a primary law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Permit me to say to the Senator from Iowa he has heard the last of my interruptions. A discourteous and sarcastic reply always closes my interruption of any Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. I can not insist upon his interruption but I can at once disclaim any intention of discourtesy. On the other hand, I tried to be to the last degree courteous. I said that the record of the Senator from Idaho is not material here, and I was proceeding to say that his opposition to the primary law is well known. It has been expressed upon every appropriate occasion. I am only trying to bring him to the end which his own reasoning must inevitably carry him, because if he had been a member of the Legislature of Wisconsin and had voted for a man because he had been selected in a primary for that reason alone, necessarily his vote would have been a dishonest if not a corrupt vote.

Mr. President, the attack upon the primary laws of the United States that is manifest in this case necessarily leads us into a little broader field of inquiry, for I regard that as the great vital issue here. More than half of the States of the Union, I think nearly two-thirds of the States of the Union, have provided in some form or other, some of them efficiently, some of them inefficiently, for the nomination of candidates for the Senate of the United States through primary elections. I believe no man who looks in an unprejudiced way over the political field can doubt that the movement which is already powerful is growing with the passing of every day, and no man can doubt that within a comparatively short while every Senator who holds a seat in this body will have been selected by his party as its candidate in a popular election, and will have been elected by the legislature as a consequence of such selection, unless we are so fortunate as to witness the adoption of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the country which will provide for the direct election of Senators by all the people.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Even then, if the Senator will pardon me, that would not stop the primary, because then each party would probably hold primaries to select its candidate before the general election.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. I was about to add that when this power is given to the voters of the country, and I hope it will be given before very long, then just so long as political parties exist they will present their candidates to the electorate as a whole through the medium of primary popular elections.

If that be true, Senators, what will you say to a proposition which in effect declares that the primaries at which the selection is made can be corrupted and yet the legislature following the direction of the primary can give a valid title to a seat in this body? To me the proposition is so abhorrent not only to good morals as we have known good morals for years and years but so abhorrent to the tendency toward a closer tie between the voters and Senators of the United States that I confess it is hard to be complacent when it is known that a vote is about to be had from which the people of this country can infer, at least, that the Senate looks upon the corruption of the primary as a remote and not a proximate cause of the election by the legislature, a Senate that looks upon the corruption of the primary as so far removed from its membership and the laws under which the election of its members takes place as to be beyond the examination and the consideration of the Senate in determining whether the seat has been honestly or dishonestly won.

Mr. President, I hasten to say that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] have dissented from that proposition, and I am very glad that they have dissented from it; but I am compelled to say that they "keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to our hope."

If this minority of the majority assenting to the doctrine, which it seems to me must command the assent of all thoughtful men, yet require of it an application which must make it ineffectual and useless, we reach finally the same unfortunate conclusion. I do not differentiate very much between the argument presented by the Senator from New York and that presented by the Senator from Ohio. I assume—I ought not to assume, but it is probable—that the Senator from Utah will pursue the same general thought.

What is it? It is that while the corruption of the primary may invalidate a seat in the Senate conferred by the legislature which follows the direction of the primary, we must prove that enough of the primary voters were corrupted to reduce the vote of the successful candidate below the plurality or the majority, as the case may be, required by the law to make a nomination; and, further, must mark and distinguish these voters. Senators, if we hold to that doctrine, it will be just as fatal to the purity of the primary, just as fatal to the efficiency of the popular selection of candidates, as though we were to hold the doctrine presented by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], namely, that the corruption of the primary is immaterial. In the very nature of things we can not follow, no human tribunal will ever be able to follow, the money to the individual voter sufficiently to answer the test which is proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. I do not believe that it is the law.

The Senator from Ohio says that we ought to judge this case according to the law as it was when the primary election under examination took place. I agree with him. I do not know just what he means by "the law," however, and I will endeavor to elucidate my own opinions upon that subject. We are not greatly concerned with the law of Wisconsin, when the Constitution imposes upon us the duty and confers upon us the power of judging of the election of a Senator of the United States. We are to discharge that duty and to exercise the power independently of any law of the State of Wisconsin, or of any other State whose affairs may come here under consideration. If the State of Wisconsin had no law respecting the conduct of the primary elections, our duty would be precisely the same. If the State of Wisconsin had a law which, in our judgment, did not raise sufficiently high the standard of honesty, purity, and morality, still our duty would be the same. We are to judge of the election of Mr. STEPHENSON not according to the law of Wisconsin. I do not believe that Wisconsin can impose upon the Senate of the United States limitations of its power, conferred by the Constitution of the United States, nor do I think the State of Wisconsin can create standards for determining our duty that are not in harmony with our own opinions upon those subjects.

We are controlled, first, in a measure, by the precedents of the Senate, for while we are not bound by these former declarations, yet in order to insure that stability which is so essential in the administration of all human affairs, we ought to give great weight to decisions of former Senators with respect to such things. But above and beyond the precedents of the Senate, we are bound by our civilized opinions with respect to honesty, fairness, and decency. If we are not to be controlled by these standards, we have none to use in such a case as this. Therefore, it seems to me, that we are here to judge of the primary election in Wisconsin and to bring it to the test of our opinions and convictions with respect to honesty, morality, and decency as they are applied to political affairs.

Mr. President, I recognize two divisions of this subject. There are a great many things which candidates may do or may not do according to their taste, according to their sense of propriety, but which, if done, are not in contravention of the accepted rules of political morality and political honesty. I would be very far from challenging the title to a seat of any Senator, because in the conduct of his campaign he did not measure up to standards which some one man or a few men might erect to test the validity of his methods.

But there is another division. There are other things which everybody will agree are dishonest, are wrong, are corrupt, and when we find these things in the title of one who claims a seat in this body, then we ought to so declare, even though there be no written inhibition or prohibition to be found anywhere in the precedents, in the statutes of the United States, or in the statutes of the State. I do not think that my distinguished friend from Utah will disagree with me so far. I think he will concede, in a general way, the soundness of the doctrine that I have stated.

How, then, must we test these things that have been established by the evidence? If we are bound to prove that 9,000 voters were corrupted, that 9,000 men received some immoral consideration or unlawful consideration for their votes, if we are bound to point out and designate the 9,000 men who were thus corrupted or changed from the course which they otherwise would have pursued, then this challenge of the title of Mr. STEPHENSON to his seat must fail, because this evidence does not show the names of 9,000 men who were corrupted; it does not show the processes through which 9,000 men were corrupted, and if it be necessary that these things be shown, then I for one fail to find in this record the proof that would be necessary to reach an adverse conclusion. I, however, do not agree to that rule; and I do not agree to it because I want to preserve the primary election in the selection of candidates for this office as well as for all other offices. I do not agree that it is necessary to discover and point out the persons who were improperly influenced in order to challenge and to characterize the election as a corrupt election.

There are two rules that have been recognized in the Senate in former times. One is that if a third person or third persons, without any participation or knowledge on the part of the sitting Member, corrupt enough votes to change the result, then the title fails. The other rule is that if the sitting Member, or the person who has received the certificate, himself participates in or has knowledge of or is responsible for the corrupt change of a single vote, then the title fails as completely as it would in the other instance where a sufficient number to change the result were shown to have been changed.

What rule does the Senator from Utah apply in this case? I asked yesterday in debate his opinion with regard to this state of affairs: Suppose Senator STEPHENSON had given to Mr. Edmonds $107,000 to accomplish his election by the legislature upon the hypothesis that there had been no primary election, and suppose that, concerning the members of the legislature, Mr. Edmonds had done the things which he is shown to have done with respect to the primary election, would the election have been an honest one? Would the Senator from Utah sustain the title to a seat procured in that way?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WORKS in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin had given Mr. Edmonds $107,000, as he did in this case, and had said to him, as he did in this case, "I want you to keep within the law," and I believed, as I do believe, that the Senator from Wisconsin meant what he said, and Edmonds had spent the money corruptly, which I do not believe he did, and the Senator from Wisconsin had had no knowledge of it, I would not declare his seat vacant.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Utah has put into his answer so many conditions that it is a little difficult for me to know just what he believes with respect to the precise question I asked him. I infer that he believes that going in before a legislature, free to elect anybody that it desires to elect, if the Senator from Wisconsin had given his agent $107,000, and through the expenditure of that money the election had been accomplished, still Senator STEPHENSON could not be held to have had knowledge of or be responsible for the manner in which the money was expended.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, the Senator from Iowa, if I understand him now—perhaps I misunderstood him before—speaks about a case where the election is to be accomplished by the legislature without the intervention of a primary. Is that correct?

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, in that case I think nobody could conceive of any good reason, any legitimate reason, why any agent should be intrusted with the expenditure of $107,000. I can conceive of no legitimate use such a sum of money could be put to in an election to be accomplished entirely by the legislature without the intervention of a primary vote. But when you come to a primary vote, the situation is altogether different. I will not take up the time of the Senator to point it out now, because I intend a little later on to enter into the matter in some detail, but it involves—it may involve at any rate—the organization of the State, because when a man is a candidate before the primary he has no party organization behind him; he must constitute his own organization, if he has any, and he may expend money in a variety of ways, all perfectly legitimate; and so no presumption of law and no strong presumption of fact, in my judgment, follows from the mere fact under those circumstances that this large sum of money has been intrusted to agents to expend, because I can conceive of perfectly legitimate ways in which that amount of money under those circumstances could be expended, but I could not in the case of which the Senator speaks.

Mr. CUMMINS. I entirely agree with the Senator from Utah with regard to the case I put. I find that we concur upon that proposition. Now, we pass to the question of the primary.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. KERN. Referring to the suggestion of the Senator from Utah that Senator STEPHENSON admonished his managers to keep within the law, I desire to call the attention of the Senator, if it will not interrupt him, to the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin as to what he meant by that. I will read briefly from page 50 of the record.

Senator POMERENE. Did you say anything to him—

Referring to one of the managers—

as to the method of expending it?

Senator STEPHENSON. No, sir.

Senator POMERENE. Or the purpose for which it was to be expended?

Senator STEPHENSON. No, sir; nothing.

Senator POMERENE. When was it you said to him that you wanted him to keep within the law?

Senator STEPHENSON. At different times—to keep within the law.

Senator POMERENE. When was the first time?

Senator STEPHENSON. I think when I first talked, that it must be in accordance with the law.

Senator POMERENE. What did you mean by that?

Senator STEPHENSON. In our primary election, if a man was running for the legislature in the primary election, you understand, that he should not help him for his nomination.

Senator POMERENE. Did you have anything else in mind?

Senator STEPHENSON. No; nothing in particular.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, Mr. President, my view of it is—and I think we must hold that doctrine if we are to preserve primary elections—that when a candidate for nomination gives his selected agent a sum of money to expend in the primary election he becomes responsible for the manner in which it is spent, and if it is spent corruptly the title to his seat is as effectually impaired or destroyed as though the candidate had personal knowledge of the precise way in which the money was expended. There is no other way in which we can hold to the purity of our primary elections. If the Senate is about to hold that a man may give another man $107,000, with the direction that it is to be expended within the law, and then shield himself by his ignorance of the way in which the money is expended, there is no safety either in elections by legislatures or in nominations by popular vote.

Of course, if one wanted to buy his way in a popular election, he would not himself participate in the corrupt agreement. It is almost inconceivable that one who would aspire to a seat in this body would himself enter the details of a corrupt performance of this sort; but will the Senate say that if a candidate puts money into hands that do corruptly use it, nevertheless it is an honest election so far as he is concerned? Will it be contended, after it is shown that $107,000 was put into the hands of Mr. Edmonds to influence the primary election in some way, that, in order to escape the consequences of that act, we must show that the individual voters to the extent of diminishing the vote cast for the sitting Member below a plurality were actually corrupted?

Does the Senator from Utah, does any Senator—for I will not make the question specific—does any Senator believe that if a candidate before a legislature gives to his agent whom he selects to carry on his campaign $10,000 to be expended in his campaign, and that agent corrupts a single man in the legislature, the title to the seat is still secure and perfect? No. If the candidate furnishes the means by which the corruption was practiced, and if it was practiced upon a single person in the case of the legislature, I think that the well-established principles, not only of honesty but the fair inferences from the proceedings of the Senate heretofore, would invalidate a seat so secured. Therefore, when Mr. STEPHENSON set afloat $107,000, confided it to other hands with instructions that it was to be spent to accomplish a particular purpose, if it was spent for a corrupt purpose, if it did destroy the free will and the unbiased judgment of the voters of Wisconsin to any extent, then I believe that the sitting Member must be held responsible for that corruption of the electorate; for if we do not hold that rule, then corruption in the primaries of the country can be practiced without any restriction whatsoever.

I do not admit that the law of Wisconsin could be invoked in order to make an act dishonest which we regard as honest; indeed, I believe it could not be so invoked. Then will those who follow me, will the Senator from Utah, tell the Senate what protection we have in this country against the invasion of primary elections? How are we to preserve their purity if legislatures are to accept the decisions of these elections as controlling upon their votes and if the candidates are permitted to corrupt this public expression?

Suppose that the House of Representatives were to engage in a contest over an election itself; suppose Mr. STEPHENSON had been a candidate for the House of Representatives, and it had been shown that he did there precisely what he did here, what would be the judgment of the House of Representatives upon that election? Would it be necessary, in order to invalidate the election, to show that enough individuals were actually corrupted to reduce his vote below the vote of his opponents? I do not think so. I do not believe we can hold that rule and still hold fast to the present system of nominating candidates for Senator of the United States.

I look upon the influence of this vote as vastly more comprehensive and far-reaching than the determination of the title of Senator STEPHENSON to a seat in this body. We must deal justly with him; but in determining what is justice to him, we ought to gravely and seriously consider what is justice to the people of the United States.

We are now engaged, throughout the whole country, in one of the most momentous struggles that civilization has ever seen with regard to representative government. No matter what may be true in the States, no matter how applicable the initiative and referendum may be to smaller communities and more homogeneous people, I think it is everywhere conceded that the Government of the United States must remain a purely representative Government.

I myself have not allowed my faith in representative government to weaken. I believe the people should select their representatives in this and other governing bodies of the country. And if we are to do it, if we are to preserve their confidence in the Government of which they are a part, then their will—their unpurchased, honest will—must control in the selection of those representatives.

As it seems to me, the fate of our institutions will be determined in the decision of just such cases as this. I do not assert, of course, that the decision of this case one way or the other of itself will be conclusive as to the course that we will pursue in the future. But all these things go to make up the judgment of the people with regard to the character of the institutions under which they live.

The people have determined that they will nominate their candidates for the House of Representatives in primary elections, and they do it in nearly two-thirds of the States of the Union. The people have determined that they will select their party candidates for the Senate of the United States in popular elections. They intend to so select them, and they will in some way accomplish their purpose. And if we, in our consideration and decision of this controversy, shall say to them that the instrumentality which they have adopted for the purpose of selecting their candidates can be corrupted, if it can be turned aside so that the man whom they would select is not selected, we will still further impair and finally destroy their faith in representative government.

I hope that, no matter what may be the result of this controversy, the debate here will make it so clear that he who runs may read, that primary elections, in the judgment of the Senate, are sacred and inviolable against the power of money and the influences of corrupt practices.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, I desire to state very briefly——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Crane	Jones	Page	Warren
Culberson	Kenyon	Percy	Watson
Cullom	Kern	Perkins	Wetmore
Cummins	Lea	Pomerene	Works
Curtis	Lippitt	Rayner

Mr. BURNHAM. I wish to say that my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have responded to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, I desire to state very briefly my reasons for signing the views of the minority in this case.

According to my view there are but two questions in the case:

First. Can the Senate of the United States investigate a primary election where the primary resulted in the election by the legislature of the nominee of the primary?

Second. Does the evidence in this case show that the nomination of Senator STEPHENSON in the primary on September 2, 1908, was obtained by corruption?

I believe both of these questions can and should be answered in the affirmative; therefore I joined with the minority in the expression of its minority views.

Precedent would permit us to hold that such has been the view of the Senate heretofore, for in at least two cases it has been decided by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, under such circumstances as to be tantamount to a decision by the Senate of the United States, that the Senate would and should consider other acts than those that merely took place in the formal election of the candidate by the general assembly. I refer to the Caldwell case from Kansas and to the Payne case from Ohio.

In the Caldwell case the most serious charge against the sitting Member was that he had expended the sum of $15,000 for the purpose of getting another candidate, a formidable rival, to withdraw his candidacy. That was a matter entirely outside of the legislative act of electing a Senator; yet the Committee on Privileges and Elections held that that constituted a corrupt method and practice, and the attitude of the Senate was evidently the same, for the sitting Member resigned before the question could be voted upon by the Senate.

In the Payne case three views were expressed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. A majority, however, took the position and held firmly to the idea that the Senate could and should investigate the methods of caucuses, where the nominee of the caucus, because he was the nominee of the caucus, had been elected Senator.

I desire in this connection to read the views of Senators Hoar and Frye, because they represent so fully my ideas upon this subject:

> If B, C, and D have promised to vote as A shall vote, if A be corrupted, 4 votes are gained by the process, although B, C, and D be innocent. In looking, therefore, to see whether an election by the legislature was procured or effected by bribery, it may be very important to discover whether that bribery procured the nomination of a caucus, whose action a majority of the legislature were bound in honor to support.

I think that case is parallel to the case here, for no one who has read the record can doubt that Senator STEPHENSON was elected solely and entirely because he was the nominee of the primary of September 2, 1908. It is safe to say that had he not received that nomination his name would not have been presented to the legislature which assembled in January, 1909.

The records of that general assembly show that at least 10 members of the assembly in casting their votes on different occasions for Senator STEPHENSON stated that they voted under protest and that they voted for him because he was the nominee of the primary. In this connection I have prepared a table showing the votes of the members of the legislature and how various members voted for this candidate or that candidate because he had received the instructions either of the State or of the district which the member represented. I should like permission to print that table without reading it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. LEA. I desire, however, to read certain statements that were made.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LEA. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would suggest to the Senator that inasmuch as the RECORD will not be again printed before Senators vote, and the Senator doubtless desires that the information contained in this statement shall be accessible to the Members of this body, it might be well to read it; otherwise it will not come to the attention of Senators until after the vote.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, as the table furnishes only certain results from a primary, a question which is really not under discussion to-day, however much it may have been discussed by the committee that made this investigation, if there is objection I will withdraw the request.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, I do not object.

Mr. LEA. I do not think it is of great importance in the case; but I do think it is of importance in the discussion of the question of primaries, which has been injected into the case.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should not like to have the Senator think I objected. I only made a suggestion as to the manner of bringing it to the attention of the Senate, in the interest of the Senator's presentation of the case, and not as an objection.

Mr. LEA. I thank the Senator for his suggestion, but I will read certain statements made by members of the Wisconsin Legislature in voting for Senator STEPHENSON, showing that they voted for him because he was the primary nominee.

Mr. Georgi stated, in voting:

> Mr. President, having due regard for the primary election law, and not knowing of any candidate otherwise than the one elected at the primary election, I feel bound, contrary to my own opinion, to vote for ISAAC STEPHENSON; but I do so under protest.
>
> Mr. HAMBRECHT. Mr. President, owing to the fact that the people of the State of Wisconsin have placed in nomination at their primary election a man, I feel in duty bound to recognize that and vote for ISAAC STEPHENSON.
>
> Mr. KUBASTA. In conformity with the primary-election law and wishes of my constituency and those in Wisconsin, I vote for ISAAC STEPHENSON.
>
> Mr. LEDVINA. Mr. President, in conformity with the primary-election law, I vote for ISAAC STEPHENSON.
>
> Mr. MAINS. For ISAAC STEPHENSON, under protest.
>
> Mr. FRANK SMITH. Mr. President, owing to the fact that we have a primary-election law in this State, and under the law ISAAC STEPHENSON received the plurality of all votes cast for the office of United States Senator, and that Dane County was one of those counties that helped to roll up that plurality, I feel it my duty in carrying out the wishes of my constituents to vote for Hon. ISAAC STEPHENSON.
>
> Mr. SIMON SMITH. Mr. President, having still in mind the vote of my district and having great respect for the primary-election law, I vote for ISAAC STEPHENSON under protest.
>
> Mr. WEHRWEIN. ISAAC STEPHENSON, under protest.
> Mr. BALLARD. Mr. President, I wish to change my vote, under protest, for ISAAC STEPHENSON.

The table.

RECAPITULATION.

On final ballot: The representatives of 15 counties that went for McGovern, voted for STEPHENSON. The representatives of 10 counties that went for Cook, voted for STEPHENSON. The representatives of 5 counties that went for Hatton, voted for STEPHENSON.

The report of the joint senatorial primary investigation committee of the Wisconsin Legislature makes a statement on page 18 of that document which is much in point here:

> Had each member of the legislature consistently voted for the choice of his district for United States Senator, no one could ever have been elected. STEPHENSON would have received 51 votes, Cook 24 votes, McGovern 25 votes, Hatton 8 votes, Brown 17 votes, Hoyte 4 votes, and Rummel 4 votes.

This table, the names presented in it being collaborated from the final ballot, shows that Senator STEPHENSON received the votes of 30 counties or districts he had not carried in the senatorial primary. Thus of those who had not been for Senator STEPHENSON, and whose counties or districts instructed for another, 30 held that, in effect, Senator STEPHENSON having carried 57 counties and having received more votes than any other candidate, was the nominee of the senatorial primary.

They held this "State instruction" above their "county" or "district instruction."

It is evident from this, Mr. President, that at least 10 and perhaps more of the members of the General Assembly of Wisconsin voted for Senator STEPHENSON solely and entirely because he was the nominee of the primary. The primary nomination, therefore, resulted in his election. And if we are not to inquire into the methods and practices employed in the primary, we are not to inquire into the real facts that caused the election of Senator STEPHENSON.

If the Senate is to establish the precedent that it can investigate only the formal election by the members of the general assembly in convention assembled, it is to establish a precedent that it will not investigate the elections of, perhaps, nine-tenths of its Senators, and will not have the power to make such an investigation even if it be proper to make the investigation. For it is a matter of common knowledge that except in a few cases where the political parties of a State are divided into factions, the real contest in the election of a United States Senator occurs either in the caucus that precedes the ballot in the legislature or in the primary that precedes the assembling of the legislature.

However displeasing and disappointing it may be to some Senators in this Chamber, the fact that the primary election is growing and being adopted year by year by more States makes it unwise for the Senate to establish a precedent that it will not investigate primary elections. For the time will come when every Member of this body will sit here by virtue of having been the nominee of some primary election preceding the formal election by the members of the general assembly, or, as I hope, the election by the people of the State under the constitutional amendment that is pending.

Believing, therefore, that the Senate can investigate the primary, the only other question to be considered is, Does the testimony show that corrupt methods or practices were employed in the primary?

The view I take of this case is that when Senator STEPHENSON filed his sworn statement, setting out that $107,793.05 had been expended in the primary campaign, a prima facie case was established. While I recognize that the burden of proof must always rest upon those who hold that the election was invalid, nevertheless the duty of going forward with the proof then devolved upon Senator STEPHENSON; and it was his duty to rebut the prima facie case established by the expenditure of that enormous sum of money. If he failed to do that, the prima facie case became conclusive, and his election must be held invalid.

But it is insisted that this presumption did not arise because counsel asked these questions of every witness:

> Did you spend any money in this campaign, either directly or indirectly, for the purpose of bribing or corrupting or unlawfully influencing any electors for the support of the Senator in the primary election?
> Was any money expended, to your knowledge, by any of the men to whom you intrusted these funds as you have described, either directly or indirectly, for the purpose of bribing or corruptly or unlawfully influencing any voters in that election in the interest of Senator STEPHENSON?

The fact that these questions, asked every witness by counsel for Senator STEPHENSON, were answered in the negative, prevents this presumption from arising. It is also insisted by the counsel for Senator STEPHENSON that because expert witnesses, professional politicians, showed that a vast sum of money—$180,000 or $200,000—could have been expended in the 2,200 precincts in Wisconsin without any corruption, the presumption does not arise in this case.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LEA. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. The expert testimony was not received by the committee. It was offered, but the committee declined to receive expert testimony as to what sum might be expended.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, when I say "expert testimony" I refer to the testimony of men like Riordan, Perrin, and others, who testified that they had had 15, 20, or 40 years' experience in the politics of Wisconsin, and that, in their opinion, that sum of money could have been expended properly—not only properly, but necessarily—for the purpose of getting out the vote in the 2,200 precincts in Wisconsin. I think Mr. Edmonds, Senator STEPHENSON'S campaign manager, testified that the smallest sum a man could have expended to organize properly the State was the sum of $180,000.

I will grant that $107,000 could have been expended legitimately. It might have been all expended for the rent of offices or the headquarters of the campaign. But, of course, we know that is absurd. It might have been all expended for stamps, all for printing, or all for printing and postage for the purpose of sending out campaign circulars; and proof of that fact would have rebutted the presumption. But the facts in this case do not show that to have been so. They show that after deducting what may be called the legitimate expenses—expenses for printing, stationery, telephones, telegraph, traveling expenses, advertising in newspapers, and a lump sum of nearly $10,000 classified as "sundries," there remained over $62,000 which was expended for "organizing the State."

There is very little light shed upon what the term "organization" means. Yet in that testimony we find expenditures called "general" or "general organization"; and the word "general" occurs so often and for such vast amounts that we can almost draw the conclusion that the Wisconsin generals are as ubiquitous as the Kentucky colonels. I think sixteen times, aggregating a total of several thousand dollars, this item of "general" occurs, in connection with sums varying from $5 to $300 in each instance.

It is my contention that the expenditure of $62,000 in this case not only did not rebut the presumption to which the sworn statement of Senator STEPHENSON gave rise, but it strengthened that presumption. I am going to discuss briefly only three phases of that expenditure.

The first of these is the expenditure that went to ward or poll workers.

The record teems with illustrations of men being paid $5, $15, or $20 at polling places for the purpose of handing out cards for Senator STEPHENSON, or creating at the polls Stephenson sentiment, when, in point of fact, we know that when those men sold their labor they were at the same time selling their votes and influence, even though that fact be concealed under the euphonious term "organization."

I think the statement of Senator STEPHENSON'S manager was conclusive, when in reply to a question asked by the chairman of this committee, "How many votes would Senator STEPHENSON have received had these men not been employed?" he said, "Not very many." And if in that primary, the winning of the nomination of which resulted in his election, Senator STEPHENSON would have received only a very few votes had not those men been employed at the polls, the conclusion is irresistible that the expenditure of over $60,000 solely for the purpose of organizing and employing these men at the polls was a form of bribery and corruption that justifies us in holding his election invalid.

Then we pass to the question of expenditure to State officers, and two of the worst spots in this record are where the money was expended to State officials. I refer first to the money that was paid to J. W. Stone, State game warden. There was the sum of $2,500 paid in currency to the State game warden, and paid, as this record shows, under the direction of Senator STEPHENSON himself. And for what purpose? For no other purpose than for the purpose of buying the influence and power of that office, which Senator STEPHENSON'S manager says was the most powerful political office in Wisconsin. The circumstances under which this money was paid show that it was a suspicious act, and that the men doing it knew that they were doing wrong. As I recall the testimony, Manager Edmonds says that Mr. Stone came to him and said that he had had a conversation with Senator STEPHENSON at Marionette, and as the result of that conversation Senator STEPHENSON authorized him, Mr. Edmonds, to pay to Stone the sum of $2,500. Stone refused to take it in a check or in a cashier's check, but demanded the money in currency, in large bills of $100. What was Mr. Stone to do with it? The testimony is very clear and uncontradicted that he was paid, but the purpose for which this money was paid Mr. Stone is not equally clear. I wish to read in this connection a short extract from the evidence of Mr. Stone:

> The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose was that money given you?
> Mr. STONE. It was to be expended in the interest of Mr. STEPHENSON'S primary campaign.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. Was it to be expended by you, or were you authorized to pay it out to others to be expended by them?
>
> Mr. STONE. I was to use it at my own discretion.
> * * * * * * *

In referring to the uses that were to be made of part of this money that was passed by Stone to one of his deputies, H. A. Bowman, the following testimony is interesting:

> The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose did you give that to Mr. Bowman?
>
> Mr. STONE. For him to use in the interest of Mr. STEPHENSON'S campaign.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. Did you tell him the use he was to make of it?
>
> Mr. STONE. I did not.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. Did you discuss with him the manner in which it was to be used?
>
> Mr. STONE. I presume he naturally did——
>
> The CHAIRMAN. What was said as to the manner in which that money was to be used?
>
> Mr. STONE. It was to be expended for workers.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. For workers?
> Mr. STONE. Yes.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. Workers to do what kind of work?
> Mr. STONE. Ordinary election work.

The record contains other testimony of that kind. Another instance was the payment of $2,350 to L. L. Dresser, a member of the Wisconsin Board of Control. Mr. Dresser recognized that this was improper, and he defends his action by saying he did not pass it on himself to the "ultimate consumer," the voter, but that he selected trustworthy men in each of the counties of which he was to have charge for the purpose of passing this money out to the voters.

Then we come to the question of payments that were made to candidates for the legislature. There are two classes of these payments—payments made to men who were candidates for the legislature, but who were defeated, and to men who were candidates for the legislature and who were elected.

As I understand the law of Wisconsin, it prohibits any candidate for Senator from contributing to the campaign fund of any candidate for the general assembly except the candidates that may be in the same district as that in which the senatorial candidate lives. These instances show an absolute violation of the Wisconsin statute law.

The testimony shows that some of Senator STEPHENSON'S agents paid to a man named Smith, who was a candidate for the legislature, the sum of $250, although the record does not disclose one single act that Smith was to perform for that money. They were unable to show a single duty that was imposed upon him by the payment of it. What does that mean? It means that if Smith had been elected to the legislature he would have felt bound to have given his vote to Senator STEPHENSON. The payment of that amount of money to Smith is inconceivable upon any other basis. The same is true of the payment that was made to Shauers.

Then we pass on to three candidates for the general assembly who were elected. Two of them were paid $250 each, for that seems to have been the standard price to pay to a candidate for the legislature in this campaign. The other was paid $280. Two of these men, at least, were paid the sums of money by Senator STEPHENSON; and, as it is stated in this record, the laws of Wisconsin prohibit campaign contributions of this kind from senatorial candidates for the legislature, an instance, therefore, of violation of the statutes of Wisconsin by Senator STEPHENSON.

Much has been said of the beautiful sentiments expressed by Senator STEPHENSON and his managers about obeying the law; how they assembled and said to each other and to themselves, "We must keep within the law; we must not violate the law"; and then they proceeded to violate the statutes of Wisconsin, and to violate the rules of ordinary decency and propriety, and apparently wept because there was nothing else to violate.

Mr. President, the Senate has another contested-election case before it. That case was passed upon by the Senate about a year ago, and it was held, in effect, by the majority of the Senate that there was one material fact absent, that there was no proof in that case of any corruption fund having been assembled for the purpose of corrupting any members of the legislature that elected the sitting Member whose seat was being contested. But the Senate was unanimous a short time thereafter in voting to reopen that case for the purpose of finding out whether there was a colossal corruption fund for the purpose of bribing members of the legislature. By that vote, I take it, the Senate meant that with the other facts present in that case—the confession by members of the legislature that they had been guilty of accepting bribes, together with proof of a colossal corruption fund of over $100,000—it would justify the unseating of the sitting Member. Otherwise the reopening of the case can not be explained.

Now, in this case we have all the elements concurring that could possibly concur in that case if the second investigation—and upon what it may show I am not speaking—showed that an enormous corruption fund had been collected and disbursed. We have in this Stephenson case the expenditure of the sum of over $100,000. We have it expended under circumstances which show that the statutes of the State of Wisconsin were violated and that it was by corruption that the primary nomination was secured by Senator STEPHENSON.

Although I do not think it is necessary, I want to say here the fact that a man has avoided committing criminal acts in his campaign which, if committed, would have made him a proper inmate of the penitentiary does not mean necessarily that he is legally elected a Senator. But we have in this case violation of law. We have facts showing the individual bribery and corruption of voters at the polls, and under circumstances that showed it had the effect of electing the candidate. How can anyone who voted to reopen the other contested-election case upon the theory which I have discussed vote that the election of STEPHENSON was legal and valid when all the facts that could possibly have been shown by the second investigation to have existed in the other case exist in the case before us?

It is not a pleasant duty, Mr. President, either to make these statements or to cast a vote against Senator STEPHENSON. I am sure I am relating what is true of every member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections when I say that I had hoped, when this case was first referred to that committee to determine whether an investigation should be made, that on account of the age and the honorable life the sitting Member had lived heretofore the facts would warrant the committee in returning a report that an investigation was not necessary. But the committee decided that an investigation was necessary, and it is our duty to vote as the record shows the facts to be.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I desire to state that my vote is determined in this case by the principle of law announced by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] in another case as applied to the facts as shown by the testimony of Senator STEPHENSON'S own manager. In discussing the Lorimer case February 14, 1911, the Senator from New York announced this principle:

> If on the whole testimony the Senate be of the opinion that but for the influence of the corrupt methods or practices employed the candidate would not have been elected, the election should have been declared void.

On page 259 of the report of the committee, Mr. Edmonds, Senator STEPHENSON'S chief manager, established the following facts:

> The CHAIRMAN. There seems to have been a general apathy. These men whom you have employed to get out the vote for Senator STEPHENSON seem to have managed to get out 56,839 votes out of 470,480 votes in the State. Had you not employed these men, would Senator STEPHENSON have gotten any votes at all?
> Mr. EDMONDS. Not very many.

Mr. President, if the facts be as Manager Edmonds states them to be and everyone reading this record must know them to be, that Senator STEPHENSON would have received "not very many" votes except for the employment of men at a cost of over $62,000, that amount being expended according to Senator STEPHENSON'S sworn statement for such purposes, the remainder being expended for purposes avowedly legitimate, and if the principle of law announced by the Senator from New York is sound, as I conceive it to be, I am constrained to be of the opinion that but for the influence of corrupt means practiced and employed by the expenditure of this enormous fund Senator STEPHENSON would not have been elected, and that his election should therefore be declared invalid.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the very able argument which was made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] a short time ago has very much simplified my task. He covered so well and so ably very much that I had intended to say that I shall be able to condense my remarks within a much shorter space than I had originally intended.

There are three principal questions which I desire to discuss. The first is as to whether or not there was any corruption or bribery in connection with the election by the legislature itself; second, whether there was any bribery or corruption during or preceding the primary election or during or preceding the general election which can be said to have corruptly influenced the action of any member of the legislature; and, third, whether or not any corruption or bribery occurred during the primary election, and if so what effect it would have upon the subsequent election by the legislature.

So far as the election by the legislature is concerned I do not understand it to be seriously contended by anybody now that any corruption or bribery existed or, at any rate, that any corruption or bribery has been established by the evidence.

The Legislature of Wisconsin which elected Senator STEPHENSON consisted of 33 senators and 100 assemblymen. On January 26, 1909, that being the first day under the Federal statute when a vote could be taken, the two houses, in accordance with the statute, voted separately upon the election of a United States Senator.

In the senate 17 senators voted for persons for United States Senator. Twelve of these 17 votes were cast for Senator STEPHENSON, and 16 of the senators who were in the chamber simply answered "Present" and cast no votes for anybody.

In the house 82 members voted, the others, as I recollect, being absent, and of those 82 who voted for persons 60 of them voted for Senator STEPHENSON.

So it will be seen that a clear majority of the members of the senate who voted for persons cast their ballots for Senator STEPHENSON—12 out of 17.

In the house no question whatever can possibly arise, because of 82 who voted, and they were the only members present, 60 of them voted for Senator STEPHENSON.

But notwithstanding this, when the two houses met in joint assembly the following day the presiding officer of the assembly declined to declare the clear result of the election. Of course, the action of a presiding officer in declaring the result of an election in the separate houses as exhibited by their two journals is purely a ministerial matter, and its omission could not affect the right to the seat of the Senator who was actually elected. It would simply render it a little more difficult for him to present evidence to this body respecting his election, but, having presented that evidence, it is perfectly clear that the Senate would have seated him upon the election which was held upon January 26, 1909.

In this connection, I desire to call attention to the statute of the United States under which this election is held. Section 15 provides that—

> Such election shall be conducted in the following manner: Each house shall openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for Senator in Congress from such State, and the name of the person so voted for who receives a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house shall be entered on the journal of that house by the clerk or secretary thereof; or if either house fails to give such majority to any person on that day, the fact shall be entered on the journal. At 12 o'clock meridian of the day following that on which proceedings are required to take place as aforesaid the members of the two houses shall convene in joint assembly, and the journal of each house shall then be read, and if the same person has received a majority of all the votes in each house he shall be declared duly elected Senator.

You will observe, therefore, that every provision of the Federal statute had been complied with. Each house shall name one person for Senator. "The name of the person so voted for who receives a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house shall be entered," and so forth. Now, the whole number of votes cast in the senate was 17. I will not stop now to read from any of the authorities, but it has been held that the mere voting "present" or casting a blank ballot is not a vote. That can not be regarded as a part of the "votes" cast in each house in the meaning of the statute.

So it is perfectly clear, as it seems to me, that if Senator STEPHENSON had chosen to rely upon it he could have come to the Senate with an unimpeached title on the 28th of January, 1909. But instead of the presiding officer declaring the result he declined to do so, and the joint assembly proceeded to ballot for Senator, and continued to ballot from day to day thereafter until on the 4th of March, 1909, Senator STEPHENSON, of the total number of votes cast, which was 123, received 63, or a majority of 3.

Now, it is charged that certain members of the legislature had been bribed. Their names were given. But the fullest investigation failed to disclose any facts which would justify the conclusion or the inference that the charges as to their bribery were established. It was also charged that three members of the joint assembly, all being Democrats, were absent at the time the vote was taken, and that their absence had been procured by bribery or corruption. The fullest investigation of that question failed to disclose any such state of affairs. One of the men who was absent was paired with another absent member in accordance with a rule which had been recognized in both houses of the Wisconsin Legislature. His presence would still have given Senator STEPHENSON a majority of one. It was charged with reference to the other two—and they were not paired—that their absence had been procured by corruption. But there was absolutely no testimony that would justify any such conclusion.

So we may pass from that, I think, safely assuming that there is no evidence whatever of corruption or bribery so far as the election by the legislature itself is concerned.

Now, before I begin the discussion of the two remaining questions I desire to direct the attention of the Senate to the precise question which we are called upon here to investigate, and in order that it may be sharply brought to the attention of the Senate I will read from the resolution adopted by the Senate directing this inquiry.

On August 15, 1911, the Senate adopted this resolution:

> Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections or any subcommittee thereof be authorized and directed to investigate certain charges preferred by the Legislature of Wisconsin against ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, and report to the Senate whether in the election of said ISAAC STEPHENSON, as a Senator of the United States from the said State of Wisconsin, there were used or employed corrupt methods or practices.

That is as far as I need to read in the resolution.

So the committee was directed to inquire whether or not in that election "there were used or employed corrupt methods or practices." We were not called upon, and the committee was not called upon, to investigate or determine upon questions of good taste or whether the conduct of the Senator or of anybody else was in accordance with the highest ethical standards, but the inquiry was whether or not the conduct was corrupt.

I submit that much which has been said in this discussion is wholly irrelevant to the case which we have to consider. If each Member of the Senate were to be tried and judged by the ethical standards of some other Member and that other Member were in turn to be tried by the ethical standards of still another Member, I venture to say none of us would see salvation.

It is not a question of ethics. It is not a question of good taste. It is not a question whether we approve of certain methods, and it is not a question whether we regard it as unfortunate or demoralizing that a large sum of money should be spent in an election; but the question is whether or not the methods employed in that election were corrupt.

I submit that the determination of such a case, if submitted to the courts, would be governed by certain definite rules established by the law of evidence and certain substantive rules either established by statute or by the common law. The fact that this inquiry is made in the Senate of the United States, it seems to me, does not alter that fundamental principle. We are proceeding here in a judicial capacity, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] well pointed out this morning. We are not here in our legislative capacity. Under the Constitution of the United States we are made the "judge" of the election and qualifications and returns of the Members, and the word "judge" was not chosen idly. It means that we are here to render judgment, and a judgment is essentially different from an act of legislation.

We are here, therefore, in a judicial capacity to investigate this question dispassionately, to determine what the facts show, and then apply the law to the facts, and it is just as important that this great tribunal should be governed by settled and fixed rules, either provided by statute or determined by precedent or by the rules of the common law, as it is that a court making a similar inquiry should be so governed.

We can not make rules for the determination of a case as the case progresses. The rules by which we determine each case must be in some manner preexisting rules. To make rules for each case as it arose would be to confuse the office of judges with the office of legislators.

Mr. President, if I understand the attitude of some of the Senators who have spoken upon this question, their opposition to Senator STEPHENSON can only be justified by assuming one of two conclusive presumptions.

First, it is said that in this election the sum of one hundred and seven thousand and odd dollars was spent. Is it to be conclusively presumed that because that large sum of money was expended in a primary election it was corruptly spent? If so, if the conclusive presumption follows from the mere fact that this large sum of money was spent, then this whole investigation has been an utter waste of money and an utter waste of time, because that was conceded in the very beginning. Senator STEPHENSON conceded it when he filed his statement of account sworn to, which admits that he had spent $107,000, and in general terms stating for what particular purposes he spent it. So, if it is to be conclusively presumed that because an expenditure of that size was made it was corruptly expended, we have been wasting the time of this special committee which put in weeks at Milwaukee in an effort to ascertain the facts.

Of course no such presumption as that can arise in such a case; but if that presumption does not arise, it would seem to be contended that the conclusive presumption arises in detail, that each one intrusted with a sum of money to spend is presumed to have spent it unlawfully; for it is insisted that, even as against the sworn testimony to the contrary of every witness called in this inquiry, we must assume that the money spent by each of these persons was directly or indirectly to corrupt voters at the primary. It seems to me that that would be a complete reversal of the law with reference to presumptions. I think the rule of law is undoubted, that where a state of facts is reasonably capable of either one of two explanations, one that the transaction was unlawful or corrupt, the other that it was lawful, we must accept the latter as the controlling presumption.

It is true that the expenditure of $107,000 in a primary election—nothing further than that fact appearing—would seem to be unreasonable, would be such an expenditure as to call for investigation. I think the Legislature of Wisconsin were quite right, after these facts were brought to their attention, in demanding that they should be investigated; I think the investigation ordered by the Senate was quite warranted by the facts as they were then made to appear; but we do not have to go very far into an investigation of the facts and the circumstances surrounding the primary election in Wisconsin until we find, as I view it, that whatever inference, whatever presumption, might otherwise arise from the expenditure of this vast sum of money has been entirely overcome.

In the first place, there are in the State of Wisconsin 71 counties. The State contains an area almost equal to that of all the States of New England. There are 2,200 election precincts in the State. In the case of an ordinary election two parties or more are contending for the suffrages of the voters. Each one of those parties has a thorough and complete organization; a large proportion of the men enlisted in the organization render service to the party without charge. They do it because they believe that the supremacy of the party to which they belong will be for the welfare of the State or of the Nation. So a political party may employ a vast number of men to perform political duties necessary in the conduct of an election without any expenditure, or with little expenditure, of money, where the individual employing such men would be compelled to expend a large sum of money. In these 71 counties of Wisconsin and in these 2,200 election precincts there are 8,966 men in the legitimate organizations of the Republican Party. There are, in the first place, three committeemen for each precinct; there is the county committee, with a chairman and a member from each precinct; there is the State committee, with a member from each county and a chairman and other officers, aggregating altogether a perfect army of men, nearly 10,000 in number. That number of men is necessary, either to render their services without pay or with pay, to conduct the election on behalf of the Republican Party of Wisconsin.

When a man becomes a candidate before a primary he has no party behind him; he has no organization behind him. If he is to carry on his campaign with anything like the effectiveness with which the campaign at the general election must be carried on by the parties, he must make an organization. It is not difficult to see that a man earnestly desiring to obtain the suffrages of the voters of his party at a primary election could employ one man or two men in each of the precincts. It can be readily seen, as it seems to me, that a man could spend $40 or $50 legitimately in each of these precincts, and not only legitimately, but in such manner as to be above criticism. If he spent $50 in each of these 2,200 election precincts of Wisconsin, that alone would amount to the enormous sum of $110,000—more than the amount expended by Mr. STEPHENSON. In addition to that, he could expend money for legitimate advertising; he could expend money for lithographs, as he did expend it, for advertising himself in the newspapers, for circulating petitions, as he did, and in a variety of other ways.

Let me right here call attention to one of the largest single expenditures made, as shown by the testimony in this case and by the sworn account. Mr. STEPHENSON's agents expended for postage stamps alone the enormous sum of $11,399. More than one-tenth of all this sum of $107,000 was spent for 2-cent postage stamps. We can readily see that the use of this $11,399 worth of postage stamps must have represented another legitimate expenditure vastly exceeding it, because each stamp would carry out literature which required work to produce, which required clerks to fold and inclose; and I venture to say that the expenditure of $11,399 in postage stamps alone must have carried two or three times their value in documents or circulars or letters.

So it seems to me, when we come to consider these circumstances, whatever unfavorable presumption might otherwise arise from the mere fact of the expenditure of $107,000 must disappear. When we are presented with these two sets of facts—one the expenditure of $107,000 upon the one side, and the facts and circumstances which indicate clearly that it might have been and could have been legitimately expended—then, in accordance with every rule of presumption, we must accept the latter, because the latter presumption makes for lawful action and the contrary would make for unlawful action.

One other consideration in that connection, and the fact that I am about to state is to me a tremendous fact in this case. In my mind it has been one of the controlling facts. It is perfectly idle for anybody to contend that if this $107,000 was spent corruptly, was spent in the way of bribing and corrupting voters, it was not spent in widespread fashion throughout the State. It is a perfect absurdity to say that this large sum of money was used for the purpose of bribing or corrupting merely one or two or a dozen or fifty voters. If it was used corruptly at all, the corruption was widespread; not a dozen or fifty or one hundred, but hundreds and thousands of voters must have been bribed. It would have been an utterly foolish thing for men engaged in an election of this kind, undertaking to carry it by corruption, to have spent their money except in this widespread way.

This primary election occurred in the early autumn of 1908, three and a half years ago. The legislature which was elected at the election immediately succeeding the primary met in January, 1909. Immediately after the legislature met charges were brought to their attention that the result of this primary election had been brought about by corruption. An investigation was immediately set on foot. Witnesses were called from all over the State to testify before that investigating committee. After that full investigation had been made at that time, still another investigation was made subsequently by the Legislature of Wisconsin. The result of those investigations is contained—I have not the volumes here—but I think in three or four large volumes, perhaps more. Then the matter was brought to the attention of the United States Senate, and we ordered an investigation. The subcommittee, of which I was a member, went to Milwaukee and sat for several weeks hearing witnesses, not only those who had been before the Legislature of Wisconsin, but others, probing every rumor that was brought to our attention. Mr. Blaine, who introduced the original charges, the detailed charges, came before the committee, Senator Husting, and many others. The members of the legislative committee who had been opposed to Senator STEPHENSON were called before our committee, and were asked to state not only what they themselves knew, but what they had heard about it. Each one of them was asked, "Do you know of any other fact, any other piece of evidence that this committee can obtain?" "Have you heard of anything that this committee by inquiry can locate?" We obtained from those men every vestige of information which they had. Mr. Blaine, for example, when his detailed charges were read to him, stated with reference to one after the other of them, "I know nothing about that." With reference to one charge, for example, "The only information I have is that it was contained in an editorial in a newspaper." We asked who was the editor of that paper, and he told us. We sent for the editor, confronted him with his editorial, and asked him upon what he based it. If he said he had based it upon the statement of some other man, we obtained that other man and got his evidence upon the subject.

I remember one instance where a witness said that he had made a statement based upon what So-and-so had said to him. So-and-so was sent for, and he, in turn, told us that he had heard it from another man, and we sent for the other man, and still for another man. Finally, the last man called said that he had heard a couple of drummers on a train running through Wisconsin talking this subject over; that those drummers had disappeared; and that he did not know where they were. Every rumor that could be presented to this committee was followed until it faded into unsubstantial air.

Now, the proposition I make is that if this money was spent broadcast for corruption, as it must have been, if used corruptly to influence the election, with all these shrewd opponents of Mr. STEPHENSON intent upon making a case against him, with three years to work in, going, as they did, to Chicago to locate evidence; going, as they did, to the northern part of the State to locate evidence, spending money, as they did, to ascertain the facts—if after these two or three years of this investigation there could not be produced before this committee or before the Senate one single instance where any man was shown to have been corrupted or bribed, it must be because those instances do not exist. I undertake to say, without fear of successful contradiction, that there can not be found in this testimony an authenticated case of a single voter who was bribed or corrupted at that election—not one.

Mr. President, much has been said with reference to the money——

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator a question. He spoke of an investigation going on three years prior to the Senate investigation. Who made that investigation?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That investigation was made by the Wisconsin Legislature. We have the volumes here; the testimony was all taken, and was before our committee. Much of it is quoted in the record of our hearings.

Mr. OVERMAN. What was the finding of the Legislature of Wisconsin?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There were two findings, as I recall. The first finding exonerated Senator STEPHENSON. The next investigation broke up in a row—part of the members of the investigating committee found against Mr. STEPHENSON and a part of them found for him.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator says that Senator STEPHENSON's own legislature has exonerated him?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is my recollection about it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Can the Senator refer to the evidence of that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I can not. I am simply stating it from recollection.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the Senator is mistaken in regard to that. The report of the committee shows that the joint committee of the legislature which investigated the case simply disbanded without making any finding at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My recollection is—and I only speak from recollection——

Mr. OVERMAN. Has there been any finding of his own legislature condemning him?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I say a part of the members of the legislature found against him, and it was upon their report that this investigation was ordered. As I recall, their report was sent to the governor, and the governor, in turn, transmitted it to the Senate, and upon that this investigation was ordered. However, I have not that matter clearly in my mind; but I will be glad to look it up when I conclude my remarks and give the Senator the benefit of my investigation. I am told that the committee consisted of 8; that 5 were in favor of exonerating Senator STEPHENSON; and that 3 were against him.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the question of the money paid to the candidates for the legislature. There were three of them who were elected. They were Bancroft, Reynolds, and Wellensgard. It is insisted that the payment of money to these members of the legislature must have been corrupt, because it is said that we can not separate the expenditure of the money for the benefit of STEPHENSON from the expenditure of money for their own benefit, and that, therefore, their votes must have been corruptly obtained by the payment of these sums of money to them.

In the first place, I want to inquire who these men were. Mr. Bancroft had been a member of the legislature before, I think, for several terms. Mr. Reynolds had also been a member of the legislature before, and so had Mr. Wellensgard. Mr. Bancroft is now the attorney general of the State of Wisconsin, a man of standing, of good repute, of substance and property, against whom, so far as I know, no word of criticism has ever been uttered. He was elected by the State of Wisconsin attorney general after all these facts had been made apparent.

Mr. Reynolds is a well-to-do man, a man of respectability in the community in which he lives and has been a resident of Wisconsin for a great many years. The same is true of Mr. Wellensgard. Not one word has been or could be breathed against the good repute and the good standing of these three men. There was paid to Bancroft the sum of $250; there was paid to Reynolds the sum of $180; there was paid to Wellensgard the sum of $250.80—an aggregate amount of $680.80.

Senators who have spoken upon the other side of this question would have us believe that out of an expenditure of $107,000 the attorney general of the State of Wisconsin was bought with a contribution of $250, to expend partly for his own benefit and partly for the benefit of Senator STEPHENSON; that this other candidate for the legislature, Mr. Reynolds, was purchased by giving him the sum of $180, to expend in the same way; and that Mr. Wellensgard was purchased for the sum of $250.80. To my mind the mere statement of the proposition shows its utter absurdity. Can anybody pretend that men of this character would have sold their votes for the use of this comparatively trifling sum of money? Not only that, but every one of these men, as the testimony clearly shows, had been a friend of STEPHENSON of many years' standing. Each of them had been in the legislature of 1907, and each of them had supported STEPHENSON for the United States Senate in that legislature. Presumably, as friends of many years' standing, having voted for him in the preceding election less than two years before, they would have supported him in the next election. It seems to me that it is perfect and utter nonsense to insist that their attitude or their votes could have been affected in the manner indicated.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Referring to the fact that these members of the legislature had supported Mr. STEPHENSON in the previous election, and consequently that it was to be expected that they would support him in this election, is it not true that there had been a complete change in Senator STEPHENSON'S political relations with the factions of his party in the State between those two elections? In the first election he and what was called the La Follette wing of the party were in agreement, while in the second election they were not in agreement. So it does not necessarily follow that men who supported him in the first election would support him in the second.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, yes. Mr. President, Senator STEPHENSON in prior elections had supported the so-called La Follette wing of the Republican Party, and the so-called La Follette wing of the party had reciprocated by declining to support STEPHENSON; but these men did not belong to the La Follette wing of the party. Each of them testified emphatically to the effect that he had not only been a friend of long standing and that he had voted for Mr. STEPHENSON in the preceding election, but that he was a supporter of his in that election, intended to vote for him in the legislature, and that the payment of this money had absolutely no influence upon his vote. Why should we assume the contrary of what these men have said, particularly in the absence of any testimony whatever to that effect? There is a letter from Reynolds, which was published in February, 1908, long before this primary election, in which he declared himself for STEPHENSON to succeed himself. That letter you will find printed at page 1248 of the hearings. It was published in the Milwaukee Free Press of the date to which I have called attention.

Each of these men testified—and there was no contradiction of their statements—that every cent of this money was expended in the interest of STEPHENSON'S candidacy. The money paid to Reynolds, $180, was paid to him specifically for the purpose of circulating STEPHENSON'S petition in order that he might become a candidate before the primaries. Each of them went into details as to what the money was spent for. Taking them up separately for a moment, Bancroft, as I have said, received $250. He testified that he was reluctant to take it and did not want to be bothered with the matter at all. Here is his testimony. He was asked whether or not he had disbursed the money, as I recall, for Mr. STEPHENSON, and he answered:

Mr. BANCROFT. Absolutely every dollar of it. * * * I took it very reluctantly, simply because I was a supporter of Senator STEPHENSON and a personal friend and I did not like to refuse. I declined up to the last minute to have anything to do with it; but I finally took it to disburse in a certain way, which I have indicated, simply because I did not want to refuse an old friend or his managers to do what I could for him, because I was in in favor of his election.

He testified that he kept this money in a separate drawer in his safe, and, with the exception of $100 of it, which was paid to a man named Mehaffey, it was all disbursed for distributing literature. He gave forty or fifty dollars to one man named Francisco. At page 710 of the record he testified:

Mr. BANCROFT. He—

put out several buggy loads of Stephenson lithographs, and the placards that they were sending out. They had a long, triangular, banner-shaped advertisement, with the Senator's picture on the top and some advertisement below. Then they had some large lithographs of the Senator, nearly life-size. I must have received several thousand of that kind of things. Buggy load after buggy load went out, and they were instructed to nail them up in every available place—on all the railroads, crossroads, cheese factories, creameries, etc., in the county.

Then he goes on to state in detail other sums that were paid. At page 722, summing up, this appears:

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. As I understand it, with the exception of the money which you gave to Mr. Mehaffey, who resides in Richland Center, all of this money was disbursed mainly in connection with the publicity feature of the campaign?

Mr. BANCROFT. Absolutely every dollar of it.

Some criticism has been made with reference to the money given to Mehaffey. It has been said that Bancroft gave $100 to Mehaffey to go out and spend as Mehaffey might think best. While that is true in a sense, yet the inference sought to be drawn from that statement is wholly unjustified, namely, that there is any probability that Mehaffey had spent it dishonestly. About that he testifies:

Mr. BANCROFT. He—

was a wealthy man himself. He was merely a personal friend, and he knew how to do political work; at least, I supposed so. He had always gotten results; but his work was honorable and square, whatever it was.

Senator SUTHERLAND. He was a man you knew well?

Mr. BANCROFT. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. A man of high character?

Mr. BANCROFT. He was. He was a man I would trust with every dollar that I had in the world, for that matter, because he was a square fellow.

Reynolds received $180, $80 of which was paid by Mr. STEPHENSON in money and $100 of it by check. This was spent, as I have already stated, principally for circulating nominating papers, and was expressly given by Mr. STEPHENSON for that purpose. I call attention to Senator STEPHENSON'S testimony on page 38, without stopping to read it. Wellensgard received $250.80, and expended the amount principally for circulating petitions, distributing advertising matter in behalf of Senator STEPHENSON, and to get the voters to the polls; and he stated positively that the total sum was expended in the interest of Senator STEPHENSON.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. KERN. I will ask the Senator if Senator STEPHENSON'S expense account, which he swore to, does not state that the total amount paid in the State for getting signatures to nomination papers was only $225.06, and whether the total amount paid throughout the State for posting and distributing lithographs was not stated to be only $834?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, Mr. President; the account does not state anything of the sort. The account does contain an item of expenditure for obtaining signatures such as the Senator calls attention to; but it does not contain all the items of that kind.

Mr. KERN. Why does it not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Because much of it was spent in the way I have indicated. Mr. Reynolds was given this money for that purpose. That does not enter into that item. The same is true with reference to lithographs; the amount Mr. Bancroft expended for that purpose is not included in that item. It is simply one item, and the other items are included in the large sum that covers the general organization expenses, as I shall attempt to show a little later.

Mr. KERN. Does not this purport to be a correct statement of the various items of expenditure?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Why, certainly.

Mr. KERN. Is it not so sworn to by the sitting Member?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly. But because I include in an expense account an item of $200 spent for a certain purpose it does not follow that that is all I have spent for that purpose. It follows that I have spent that much in that item. The other sums are included elsewhere.

Mr. Wellensgard testified as I have said. I want to call attention to certain portions of his testimony, because he has been quite severely criticized by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] and others.

I read from page 840:

The CHAIRMAN. Were these men employed to do anything in your behalf, or to help your candidacy?
Mr. WELLENSGARD. No, sir; I never paid them a cent.
The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether or not they supported you?
Mr. WELLENSGARD. I do not; only I believe they were friendly toward me.
The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether they were STEPHENSON men before this $30 was paid, or the arrangement made to pay it?
Mr. WELLENSGARD. This man Burlingame?
The CHAIRMAN. Yes.
Mr. WELLENSGARD. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. How long had he been a STEPHENSON man?
Mr. WELLENSGARD. That I could not say.
The CHAIRMAN. When did you ascertain that he was a STEPHENSON man?
Mr. WELLENSGARD. I ascertained that from him at the time of it, or before this time when I had seen him. He had a brother that lived up in STEPHENSON'S town, you know—Marinette—in the cigar business; and he had been up there and seemed to know Mr. STEPHENSON personally.

Again, at page 842, speaking of men that Mr. Burlingame had employed:

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose were they employed by Mr. Burlingame?
Mr. WELLENSGARD. By Mr. Burlingame?
The CHAIRMAN. Yes.
Mr. WELLENSGARD. To get the voters out in their localities.
The CHAIRMAN. You mean, to induce them to go to the polls and vote?
Mr. WELLENSGARD The town of Brookfield is partly on the north side of Green Lake—

I call particular attention to this because it shows the necessity of these expenditures:

The town of Brookfield is partly on the north side of Green Lake and part of the town is on the south side of Green Lake; and those voters living on the south side have to come to the east end of Green Lake and come over to the village of Green Lake to vote.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What is the distance?
Mr. WELLENSGARD. It must be 7 miles, maybe 8, around the end of the lake, to get over there. They were employed to take their teams and get out and get the voters over.
The CHAIRMAN. There is no way of crossing by boat?
Mr. WELLENSGARD. Yes; there is.
The CHAIRMAN. There is a regular line of boats, is there not?
Mr. WELLENSGARD. No; not regular, I do not think.
The CHAIRMAN. How far is it across the lake?
Mr. WELLENSGARD. I should think it is 4 or 5 miles.

And again, in reference to another transaction:

Mr. WELLENSGARD. If you will let me explain this, I can explain it on the same basis as the other.
The town of St. Marie is split up by Fox River. Part of it is on the north side of Fox River, and they have to come around and come across the bridge at Princeton and come over to the St. Marie townhouse and cast their votes, and the men that he employed were living on the north side and had to go around by Princeton and over to the St. Marie townhouse and vote, and they hired teams, or took their teams, and brought these voters over there, and were paid for that purpose, probably.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What is the distance?
The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether or not they paid cash for any purpose whatever to these men that they brought over to vote?
Mr. WELLENSGARD. No, sir. I do not know, only what he told me.
The CHAIRMAN. Did he tell you that he did or that he did not?
Mr. WELLENSGARD. I think he did tell me that he would have to pay them something to take their teams away from the field and from their work and come around there. He did not expect to get them for nothing.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is, the men that brought the voters?
Mr. WELLENSGARD. Yes; the men that brought the voters.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What was the distance?
The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment. I will yield to counsel in a moment.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Pardon me, Mr. Chairman. I wanted to get it right in the record at this point. That is all.
The CHAIRMAN. What is the question?
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I simply wanted the distance these men had to travel.
What was the distance they had to travel, Mr. Wellensgard?
Mr. WELLENSGARD. I could not come within a mile, perhaps, or 2 miles of it. I should say perhaps 6 to 8 miles.

That was spent—what seems to be criticized here as an enormous sum of money—in one of these instances $30 and in another $25—the former for bringing voters either across the lake or around the end of the lake, 6 or 7 miles, and in the other instance for bringing voters a distance of from 6 to 8 miles. It seems to me that is not an extravagant expenditure when we come to understand the circumstances.

It has been said in this connection that a large number of men were brought down from the quarries to work at the polls; and as the Senator from Kansas became enthused upon that subject, I could see before me the vision of an army of men coming in endless procession from these quarries, all under the pay of Senator STEPHENSON. This was in the town of Berlin. Yet there were only 11 men, altogether, paid for work in any way about the town of Berlin, and part of them were not quarrymen. We do not know just how many there were, but it does appear from the evidence that some of them were farmers, and in all probability not more than three or four were quarrymen. And yet this instance of the quarrymen having been brought down to the polls and paid is stated as though they were brought down there in wholesale numbers, and as though paying them to work at the polls were a mere pretense in order to get their votes.

There was absolutely no reason why Wellensgard should have used any of this money in his own behalf. He was an exceedingly popular man in his county, as appears from the returns. There were cast in that legislative district, altogether, 1,511 votes. Out of those 1,511 votes Mr. STEPHENSON received only 330; but Wellensgard received 914—two-thirds of all the votes cast. It is perfectly idle to talk about this $250.80 having been given to him for any such purpose.

At pages 868 and 869 of the record appears the testimony of Mr. Wellensgard showing the character of man he is. He says that he is the owner of a business that produces all the way from $1,500 to $15,000 a year; that he is practically the sole owner of it; that he is the owner of a number of farms, aggregating somewhere in the neighborhood of 700 acres, or lacking a few acres of that number, and the value of which runs all the way from $5 to $150 an acre.

The question is asked:

Did this $250.80 that you received from the managers of the STEPHENSON campaign have any effect upon the vote that you afterwards cast for Senator?

He answers:

No, sir.

So I conclude, as it seems to me with perfect justice, that the use of this comparatively trifling sum of money, $680 altogether, could have had no sort of influence upon these men subsequently elected to the legislature.

I come now to a very brief discussion of the primary election. And I may say that while I am not particularly an admirer of the primary system, I think any State in the Union that desires to adopt it, having a perfect right to do so, should be protected in the exercise of such right under the statute; that the voting at the primaries should be protected against fraud and corruption precisely as the voting at a regular election should be protected; and I think if corruption occurred at the primaries, or if voters were bribed at the primary election so as to affect the result, and the legislature which was subsequently elected because of the primary vote, elected the person who received a majority of the votes at the primary, that election by the legislature would be tainted by the corruption which occurred at the primary; because, as it seems to me, in that case the election by the legislature would stand with regard to the action of the primary in the direct relation of cause and effect. So I will not stop to discuss that question, but I shall assume that if it can be shown that corruption occurred in such a way as to invalidate the primary election, that would invalidate the election held subsequently by the legislature.

In the first place, I want to inquire as to how this money came to be paid over by Mr. STEPHENSON. Mr. STEPHENSON, in the first place, is a man of large affairs, a man of great wealth, a man of great business affairs. He has been in the habit of employing a large number of men. Of course, in a great business such as he has been operating he must of necessity trust his subordinate agents. I venture to say that often he has given one of his agents carte blanche in some business affair, and probably has intrusted him with a large sum of money to expend. He can not look after the details, and so when it came to this election and he was informed that under the primary system it would be necessary to make an organization and to spend a good deal of money, he proceeded as he had been in the habit of doing. Whether that was the right way to proceed or not I shall not stop to inquire, but evidently it was the fact.

Whom did he employ? He did not go out and employ some politician, some ward heeler, as some of the statements here would tend to suggest; but he employed reputable business men, Mr. Puelicher, cashier of a bank, a man of excellent standing in the city of Milwaukee, and Mr. Edmonds, a business man of large affairs and himself a man of wealth and standing. They were his two principal managers. Sacket was the office man, but Puelicher and Edmonds were the two managers of this election.

Criticism has been made with reference to the manner in which the account was handled at the bank. There was nothing extraordinary about that. Mr. STEPHENSON, as a matter of fact, had no account at this bank. He had with the officers of the bank certain sums of money which they were investing for him, and as the money would come in from the investments they did not deposit it to an account, but kept it in the form of a cashier's check and paid it over to him whenever he desired, sometimes keeping it for some time.

At the time Mr. STEPHENSON undertook to become a candidate he had with the cashier of this bank, I think, the sum of $30,000; and having made Mr. Puelicher his financial manager, he told him to make use of that money; and the account was kept at the bank after that in precisely the same way as it had been kept for months and perhaps years before. There was no change at all in the situation.

It has been said that the money was paid out without any record being kept. On the contrary, every dollar that was paid out by Mr. Puelicher is represented by a cashier's check. Mr. Puelicher so stated, and offered to bring the checks before our committee. Every dollar of it was represented by a cashier's check. Of course, the money having passed into the hands of the subagents, they disposed of it in such manner as they saw fit, either by depositing it in a bank or by paying it out in cash; but the original expenditure, the payment of the money to the subagents, so far as Mr. Puelicher was concerned, and so far as the funds in his hands were concerned, was always in the form of a cashier's check; a record of it was kept, and there is undoubtedly a record of it there to-day in the books of the bank.

When Mr. STEPHENSON entrusted this sum of money to these managers, it was perfectly apparent to anybody who desired to be fair about this matter, that STEPHENSON was particularly solicitous that these men should keep within the law; because over and over again he said to them, when he would give money to them to be expended, "Now, keep within the law." Some criticism was made that when he was examined further he said he had in mind that they should not pay money to members of the legislature, and that he had nothing else particularly in mind; but he had generally in his mind that the sums of money that were intrusted to these agents should be spent honestly and lawfully. Mr. Edmonds testifies to that as do Mr. Puelicher, Mr. Sacket, and Mr. STEPHENSON.

As need of money arose, or, rather, as the agents insisted that they needed more money, he advanced further sums with great reluctance, rather protesting that they were spending too much money, and wanting to know the need of it. They explained to him that it was a big State; that a great deal of organization work had to be done; that he had a short time in which to do the work; and so, he finally acceded to their requests and advanced more money; but every time, as I have said, with perfectly apparent solicitude, he said to them, "Now, keep within the law." Nobody could have listened to his testimony, nobody could have listened to the testimony of these other men, without being convinced of their absolute honesty and absolute truthfulness.

These men testified before our committee, and testified before the legislative committee two or three years ago, prior to the time they came before our committee. If anything could be said against them, with Wisconsin full of opponents of Senator STEPHENSON, it is incredible that some testimony should not have been brought before us to show these men to have been untrustworthy; but to the contrary, they stood before that committee and they stand before the Senate honest, trustworthy, reliable business men, and their word ought to be taken.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Are the men the Senator is now referring to the same men he referred to when he said that they had kept the money that Senator STEPHENSON had given to them to expend for his benefit?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; they are not the same men.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Who were the men, generally speaking, that the Senator was referring to as having kept the money?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I had a note to speak of that a little later on; but perhaps I may as well do it now as at any other time.

Mr. position about that is this: I have been speaking about Edmonds and Puelicher, the two men who were the general managers, if I may use that term; and I say, without fear of suecessful contradiction from anybody, that these two men stand as high in the State of Wisconsin as any other men in it or out of it. There is not any doubt about it.

Subagents were employed, quite a large number of them. To one man $5,000 was given. He had eight counties to look after. To another man perhaps a thousand dollars or perhaps a few hundred dollars was given. They were selected in various parts of the State to look after a county or two or three counties. Some of those men gave us a straightforward account of how the money was expended and itemized every dollar of it to the entire satisfaction of the committee. Some of them did not. Some of them said, in a general way, that it was expended for this, that, or the other purpose; but they were unable to give us details—unable to give us the names of the men to whom it had been paid.

It seems to be claimed by the minority of this committee that because two or three or four thousand dollars was put into the hands of a man and he could not satisfactorily account for its expenditure it must be presumed to have been expended unlawfully; in other words, that because he did not tell us what he did with it, the presumption necessarily follows that he spent it corruptly. If these men spent the money corruptly, of course they were dishonest men; and if they were dishonest men, why does not the conclusion more naturally follow, particularly in view of the presumption that we are to assume the innocence of Senator STEPHENSON rather than his guilt, that the money never got out of the pockets of those men at all? Is it not as reasonable and as logical to conclude, when a thousand dollars has been given into the keeping of a man to expend, and he can not give an account of how he spent it, that he did not spend it at all, as it is to conclude that he spent it unlawfully? That is what I mean when I say that I am inclined to think that a good deal of the money which Mr. STEPHENSON'S agents or managers intrusted to these subagents never was expended by them at all; and, as was suggested to me by one of my colleagues upon this side the other day, who had read over this testimony, perhaps instead of this having been a corrupt expenditure of money it was a corrupt failure to expend money.

I want very briefly now to call attention to some things that have been claimed by the minority with reference to this matter; and, inasmuch as the speeches which have been made in the main follow the minority views, I may use the minority views as the text of what I am going to say rather than quote from the speeches directly.

The minority views, I undertake to say in the very beginning, when compared with the evidence in this case, are unfairly colored and misleading. I do not mean consciously so; but, in fact, they are so. I want to read, first of all, the statement under the head of "Admitted facts."

The following may be taken as admitted facts in this case: Three men were selected as managers by Senator STEPHENSON; money was placed in their hands from time to time as called for to the amount of over $107,000; they were not asked how they expended it, nor for what purpose; no accounting was requested; they paid it out in various sums to different individuals in different wards, precincts, and counties; large sums were paid to different individuals holding official positions, and to individuals recognized to be leaders, and to others of prominence in different organizations; no directions were given to these men how the money should be expended; no reports were required and no knowledge obtained as to how they spent the money or for what purpose; men were hired for the ostensible purpose of going over the country talking STEPHENSON and creating STEPHENSON sentiment; men, whose occupations led them into different sections of the country, were paid large sums of money for talking for STEPHENSON on their travels; men were paid three, five, and ten dollars per day to be at the polls on election day, or to haul voters to the polls; large sums were paid leaders in different wards and precincts to look after their wards and precincts; hundreds of dollars were spent for treating to cigars, liquors, meals, etc., as much as $135 in one day by one man; money was paid to candidates for the legislature, at least three of whom were nominated and elected; detailed expenditures were not kept; memoranda were destroyed; records and papers concerning the campaign were shifted from one place to another—

And so forth.

Remember that the statements I have read are under the head of "Admitted facts," meaning, of course, that either Senator STEPHENSON, or at least the majority of the committee who reported in his favor, must have admitted the facts. The minority do not say that these are the proven facts or their version of the proven facts; but they undertake to tell the Senate that, whatever else may be disputed, the facts that I have read are admitted. Now, I undertake to say that some of the so-called facts which are stated here are not only not admitted, but are contrary to the evidence; and that some of the facts stated here are colored in such a way that they are not admitted as they are intended to be construed by the minority views.

Now I take up the first statement:

No directions were given to these men how the money should be expended.

To whom does that apply? It either applies to these managers or to the subagents to whom these managers disbursed the money. If it refers to these general managers, the statement is absolutely contrary to the evidence. Senator STEPHENSON, first of all, testified, at page 23, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. What authority did you give Mr. Edmonds in regard to expending money on your behalf?
Senator STEPHENSON. Only to keep within the law, and——
The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose did you authorize him to expend money on your behalf?
Senator STEPHENSON. Well, we had no organization when we started, and we had to get that—advertise, newspapers, and have men. We have got 71 counties in our State. We had to get somebody in every county to work.

Again:

The CHAIRMAN. What do you understand by the expression "making a canvass"?
Senator STEPHENSON. To make the canvass within the law.
The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean? What do you understand by "making a canvass within the law"?
Senator STEPHENSON. Well, not to furnish any money to anyone that was running for the legislature that might vote for me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What page of the record does the Senator refer to now?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is at page 41.

Again, at page 101, I read from the testimony of Mr. Edmonds:

Senator POMERENE. Mr. Edmonds, when was it that Senator STEPHENSON first said to you that you should keep "within the law"?
Mr. EDMONDS. I could not be positive. I should say that in the conversation with me by phone from Marinette the night he asked me if I would assume control of the campaign, I wanted to know how far I should go into that, and I think at that time he mentioned it.
Senator POMERENE. What was said? Give us that conversation.
Mr. EDMONDS. Those were his words—"to keep within the law," if he used that term at that time, and I think probably he did.
Senator POMERENE. You talked with him later on that subject?
Mr. EDMONDS. I do not recall any particular time, but I think without question that phrase "to keep within the law" has certainly been used by him a good many times.

I now read from the testimony of Mr. Sacket:

The CHAIRMAN. What arrangement, if any, was there made with reference to the management of his campaign?
Mr. SACKET. Senator STEPHENSON asked me to do what I could to get the nomination papers, to get out the vote, and promote his interests generally, with specific instructions to keep within the law, whatever I did.
The CHAIRMAN. Was that statement made in the general terms in which you have expressed it, or was the law considered, and the question as to what would be "keeping within the law" discussed?
Mr. SACKET. He used the words, if I remember correctly, "Keep within the law whatever you do."

Again, on page 375 is the following:

The CHAIRMAN. What were those instructions?
Mr. SACKET. To do what I could to promote his candidacy and keep within the law.
The CHAIRMAN. Give us the conversation, as near as you can, the language used by Senator STEPHENSON in giving you such instructions.
Mr. SACKET. I can not remember the exact words of the conversation.
The CHAIRMAN. Give us the purport of it.
Mr. SACKET. The only part of the conversation that I do remember in exact language is that phrase "to keep within the law." The general purport of the conversation was that I go ahead and do what I could for him.
The CHAIRMAN. Within what law was it that you were to keep?
Mr. SACKET. He did not say. He simply said the law.
* * * * * * *
Senator SUTHERLAND. The suggestion to do specific work came from him?
Mr. SACKET. I do not think he was specific. He simply told me to go ahead and do what I could for him, and keep within the law. That is the substance of all he said.

With reference to subagents, to whom money was paid by Mr. Edmonds particularly, he testified as follows:

Senator SUTHERLAND. Do I understand that while you do not remember the name of the person or the particular conversation in any instance, in a general way you do remember that you admonished the people you employed, or rather, that you agreed with different people whom you employed as to the way the money should be expended?
Mr. EDMONDS. I should say this was more likely to have been the case, as I remember it. In talking with these men whom I employed—I would say they were men who were familiar with conditions, and familiar with the political situation and the laws of the State regarding the expenditure of money—I would hardly have told them not to expend money unlawfully unless in discussion they had suggested something that was unlawful, in which case I would have said so. It was not our wish or intention that any man should expend any money except in a lawful manner.
Senator SUTHERLAND. Did you, in a general way, state to the people what the money was to be used for?
Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.
Senator SUTHERLAND. You say in the case of Mr. Wayland it was understood that he was to employ speakers, to hire bands and halls, etc.
Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.
Senator SUTHERLAND. Now, while you do not remember the particular talk with any other particular individual, do you remember that, in a general way, you did state that?
Mr. EDMONDS. I should say in every instance I did go into the details of what would be done in this way.

Yet in the face of that testimony the minority in their views say that it is "admitted" that no directions were given to these men how the money should be expended. Again, the minority say:

Men were hired for the ostensible purpose of going over the country talking Stephenson, etc.

Why is the word "ostensible" put in there? In order to give that statement some sort of a sinister meaning. They were not employed for the "ostensible" purpose of going over the country talking for Senator STEPHENSON. They were employed for the real purpose of going over the country to do that, and that statement in the minority views under the head of "admitted facts" is so colored by the word "ostensible" that it carries an entirely false impression.

Again, it is said that—

Money was paid to candidates for the legislature, at least three of whom were nominated and elected.

I have already discussed that. The statement is made as though the money had been given to these candidates for the legislature for the purpose of influencing their votes instead of for a legitimate and proper purpose, as I have already shown.

Again, they say under this head of "Admitted facts" that "detailed expenditures were not kept," leaving it, of course, to be inferred that it is "admitted" that no detailed expenditures were kept. As a matter of fact, a very large number of the witnesses who testified before us as to the expenditure of this money gave the items with the utmost detail, furnishing every item. I will give to the Senate the names of several as shown by the record. There may be others in the record, but these I have gathered from it.

Mr. Van Cleve gave us a complete statement of exactly what the money he received was spent for. You will find that at pages 146 and 147 of the record. Mr. Wayland showed in detail what he expended his money for, at page 725; Overbeck, at page 834; Wellensgard, at pages 837 and 838; Beyer, at page 881; Wheeler, at pages 894 to 898; Eppling, at page 904; Morgan, at pages 927 to 932; Hulbert, at pages 954 and 955; Dresser, at page 1017; McMahon, at pages 1024 to 1026; Hambright, at pages 1064 to 1067; Ames, at pages 1185 to 1187; Russell, at page 1196; Puttell, at pages 1201 and 1202; McGillivray, at pages 1251 and 1252; Alexander, at pages 1288 and 1289; Knell, at pages 1767 to 1773; Reed, at page 1931; Hanson, at page 2004; Morley, at page 2006; and Orton, at page 2008.

Yet we are told by these minority views that it is an "admitted fact" that no detailed expenditures were kept.

They say again:

Records and papers concerning the campaign were shifted from one place to another.

A good deal has been said with reference to that.

Again, further on, and this seems to be a proposition that was peculiarly attractive to the minority of the committee, they say:

And when the committee of the general assembly started to investigate, local counsel for Mr. STEPHENSON had such records and correspondence as had not already been destroyed moved out of the State for the purpose of keeping them beyond the jurisdiction of the general assembly.

As a matter of fact, at the time those papers were moved out of the State Mr. STEPHENSON was here in Washington and never knew anything about it until he was present in Milwaukee, as the testimony shows. Why were they moved out? First of all Mr. Black, one of the counsel, testified:

I want to say in that connection, also, that Senator STEPHENSON was in Washington at the time and that I did not confer with him at all in relation to the matter.

Senator STEPHENSON testified:

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Did you have any knowledge of the contents of the box or its reception at Marinette or any disposition of it until you saw the trunk in which the contents were brought in here at this hearing?
Senator STEPHENSON. No, sir.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Did you ever have any knowledge of the movement of the box or its contents between Escanaba and Marinette or Wells, Mich.?
Senator STEPHENSON. No, sir.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. When did you first learn of that?
Senator STEPHENSON. After I came here—after the box came here.
Senator POMERENE. During this hearing?
Senator STEPHENSON. Yes. That is the first I ever knew about it.

Now, whatever was done, so far as this box of papers was concerned, was done long after the election. It was done during the time that the legislative committee was investigating the subject.

In the minority views this is stated:

And when—

Mark you, "when"—

And when the committee of the general assembly started to investigate, local counsel for Mr. STEPHENSON had such records and correspondence as had not already been destroyed moved out of the State for the purpose of keeping them beyond the jurisdiction of the general assembly.

That is stated as though when that investigation started that was done. As a matter of fact, it was not done until long after the investigation had been under way, and the reason for it is stated by Mr. Black at page 1794:

My object in doing that was not that I feared there was anything in the correspondence that would be damaging to Senator STEPHENSON'S case, but I was influenced by the fact that a lot of correspondence from all over the State, written by various people—although I did not know exactly what it was—might contain things that would cause trouble and jealousy, so that people would have each other by the ears; and I did not think it was proper that that senate committee should have it for that purpose. I was convinced that they would use it for that purpose or any other they saw fit. This was immediately after this Wagner episode, as I stated.

The Wagner episode was a frame-up, by which it was attempted to show that certain members of the legislature had been bribed. Wagner testified that he overheard a conversation in the hotel in Milwaukee through a transom. He gave the room numbers. When the committee went to look at the situation they found there was no transom there at all, and Mr. Wagner has since been serving a term in the penitentiary for perjury in that connection.

So Mr. Black, after that sort of thing had developed, and he thought they were prodding into this matter for the purpose of creating a political disturbance, and without consulting STEPHENSON at all, had these letters sent away. But, as a matter of fact, the box containing all the papers and letters was brought to this committee, and the committee went through them, and they are able to say to the Senate that from the beginning of the correspondence and papers to the end there is not one single word that indicates any culpability of any sort or description, so far as Mr. STEPHENSON or any of his agents are concerned. Yet much is made of that episode.

I could go on. The reference to Mr. Stone is misleading. They speak all the way through as though Mr. Stone had been employed by Mr. STEPHENSON. For instance, one of the statements is that—

Senator STEPHENSON personally directed that $2,500 be turned over to Stone.

As a matter of fact, Mr. STEPHENSON did not direct anything of the sort. Mr. STEPHENSON did not know anything about it, so far as this testimony shows, until long after the primary election was over. Let me read you the testimony upon which that statement is based, and all the testimony upon which it can be based.

Mr. EDMONDS. But as to just how far that went I am not positive now. I do not want to do Mr. STEPHENSON an injustice by saying that he made it if Mr. Stone reported that that was the amount agreed upon when we talked.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Then I understood you to say that you do not know why it was $2,500 rather than some other sum?

Mr. EDMONDS. Except that that was the amount that Mr. Stone thought was advisable to put in his hands; that he could use to advantage or because of the information received from Senator STEPHENSON; which I am not sure.

Upon the statement of a witness that he is not sure that a certain fact occurred it is stated in the minority views that it actually did occur.

But we do not stop there. When Mr. Stone was upon the stand he explained exactly how this $2,500 was paid, and here is the testimony:

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Were you or were you not at that time a supporter of his?

That is, at the time the money was paid.

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. State briefly just what conversation you had with the Senator.

Mr. STONE. I dropped into his office and shook hands with him, and asked him if the report was true that he was a candidate for reelection. He said he was. Then—I do not know; the ordinary conversation took place that one would naturally have under those conditions, and before I left I told him that what little I could do I would be glad to do for him.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD Was anything said in that conversation, either by yourself or by the Senator, with reference to any sum of money that you might receive for use in the campaign?

Mr. STONE. No, sir.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No sum of money was mentioned?

Mr. STONE. No money was mentioned at all.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The next thing that occurred was the conservation that you had with Mr. Edmonds in Milwaukee?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. As the result of that conversation Mr. Sacket brought in $2,500 and gave it to you?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Do you recollect whether or not, in the course of that conversation, you discussed the question as to how much you could use in the campaign, or how much it was suggested that you might use?

Mr. STONE. I think we agreed upon——

Senator POMERENE. You are directing his attention now to a talk with Mr. Edmonds?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes. Did you not suggest to Mr. Edmonds the amount of $2,500?

Mr. STONE. I think so.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. You suggested that to him, and after discussion that amount was fixed upon? Is that correct?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That was the first time, was it not, that the amount you were to receive was suggested or discussed by anybody?

Mr. STONE. That was the only time.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Did you have any conversation at all with the Senator except the conversation that you have now testified to that occurred in Marinette?

Mr. STONE. No, sir.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That was the only time you saw him during the campaign?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And it was the only talk you had with him? Is that right?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

So instead of the testimony showing that STEPHENSON had paid this money over to Stone, or authorized it to be paid over to him, the testimony shows precisely the contrary.

Now, certain things are said with reference to the organization methods. I find on page 7 of the minority views the language "Manager Edmonds's description of the organization methods," and under that head they make a quotation from Mr. Edmonds's testimony, as though that told the whole story. In that quotation it is said:

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what do you mean by "organize" when you use the term in connection with the payment of this money?

Mr. EDMONDS. I mean that the man employed by me to look after Dane County and get out the vote—the largest possible vote—for Senator STEPHENSON was given latitude, usually guided by his judgment alone, as to what was to be done (p. 77).

The CHAIRMAN. Particularize the word "organize" and tell me what constituted organization.

Mr. EDMONDS. My idea in a county that was thoroughly organized would be, in the first place, to get out the advertising that we sent to the county—have it fully distributed and posted—and after that was done he was to put in his full time going around the county, and he was paid for his services going around the county and interesting men of influence in the different localities to interest their friends so as to get out a full vote for Senator STEPHENSON election day. In some instances still further organizing, if in their judgment that was wise, by getting out the vote, by hiring teams, etc., for getting men to the polls (p. 78).

As a matter of fact, the other testimony shows that he included within that term the following things as well, namely:

The meeting of the criticisms and assaults upon Senator STEPHENSON by representatives of the other candidates, and procuring men to go out and meet the Republican voters and answer such arguments and criticisms; the expenses of procuring a list of names of Republicans in the various sections for the purpose of enabling those at the headquarters to mail literature in the interests of Senator STEPHENSON, hiring of teams and men, automobiles and men, to get voters to the polls on election day who otherwise would not be likely to go; the expense of a final canvass to ascertain, so far as they might be able, the men to be brought home and for whom teams would have to be sent on election day; the employing of workers at the polls and to check up the votes and send for those who had not voted.

You will find testimony to that effect on page 333 and in other parts of the record. So I might go through these minority views in further detail, but I have already occupied so much time that I must not do so. But I will stop to call attention to one other statement. On page 18 of the minority views a letter is quoted, written to Mr. Wheeler by C. B. Salmon:

MY DEAR WHEELER: I inclose bills in blank, which are correct. All the men and rigs were in the exclusive use of STEPHENSON, etc.

In this quotation the minority has italicized the sentence "All the men and rigs were in the exclusive use of STEPHENSON," and then a postscript is also printed by the minority in italics—

We should pay these men in the morning.

Why are the words quoted in italics? In order to suggest some sinister meaning, of course. The words themselves will not bear any improper construction; but if Senators here had seen Mr. Wheeler, as the committee did, and had heard Mr. Wheeler, as the committee did, they would have realized that a man of his standing and character could not have been involved in anything improper, as seems to be suggested by the gratuitous italics of the minority.

So they call attention to the liquor expense, and call attention to Mr. Sacket's testimony that it was the custom in elections in Wisconsin to spend large sums of money in saloons for liquor, leaving it to be inferred that Mr. Sacket followed that custom, when, to the contrary, Mr. Sacket emphatically testified that he instructed his men not to follow it. He said, "I did not tell them not to spend a dollar in the saloons, not to pay for a friendly drink, but I expressly instructed all of them," and Mr. Edmonds did the same, "not to carry on a saloon campaign."

As illustrating that, and I think I am now through, so far as these details are concerned, I call attention to the testimony of Mr. Wayland, at page 730. Mr. Wayland was one of the young men severely criticized by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. Mr. Wayland, after testifying that he had spent some money for drinks, cigars, and so on, said:

The CHAIRMAN. Did you pay for it out of the money furnished you for campaign purposes?
Mr. WAYLAND. Yes; and I reported afterwards to Mr. Edmonds what I was doing, and he requested me to discontinue that kind of campaign immediately.
The CHAIRMAN. When was that?
Mr. WAYLAND. I think he came home about the next Saturday night.

A little further on he said:

The CHAIRMAN. Then up to the middle of August you had been proceeding as you have described?
Mr. WAYLAND. Yes; I proceeded clear through to the end—I mean the way I conducted the campaign. I endeavored to show the way I conducted the primary.
The CHAIRMAN. I want to know when you ceased treating.
Mr. WAYLAND. I ceased going to saloons or buying anything in the saloons.
The CHAIRMAN. Where did you buy it—in the grocery store?
Mr. WAYLAND. No; they were saloons in grocery stores.
The CHAIRMAN. Did you cease buying drinks for these people who went to the grocery stores?
Mr. WAYLAND. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Or cigars, or treats of any kind?
Mr. WAYLAND. I gave out cigars.

So I might go on at considerable length and refer to other parts of the testimony where it appears clearly that the managers for Mr. STEPHENSON discouraged and forbade from time to time the spending of money in the saloons. Of course, they could not control some man out in a remote county who happened to have some money in his hands, but so far as they could control it they undertook to prevent it.

Mr. Wayland, as I said, was severely criticized by the Senator from Kansas, but Mr. Wayland impressed me as an enthusiastic and a very clean-cut young man, and I think he so impressed the committee. He testified with perfect straightforwardness, and gave an itemized statement of every cent he paid out during the campaign, even to 15 cents paid for a cigar.

Mr. President, with one other thought I think I shall conclude. Every Member of the Senate who has practiced law understands how important it is in determining the facts of a case to see the witnesses and to hear the witnesses testify. Indeed, when a case where the facts may be reviewed is appealed from the nisi prius court, or where a motion is made for a new trial before a new judge who has not heard the original case, it is the habit of the court to say, "The trial judge heard these witnesses; he saw them; he was able to judge of their frankness and candor;" and wherever there is any conflict in the evidence, the court will not undertake to reverse the findings of the trial judge. The subcommittee that was appointed to investigate this matter proceeded to Milwaukee, and sat there, as I have said, week after week, hearing these witnesses, and they certainly had a better opportunity to judge of the character of these witnesses, of their frankness, their candor, and their honesty than other Members of the Senate who did not see or hear them. The report of the subcommittee is unanimous; in other words, every member of the committee who heard this case has reported in favor of Senator STEPHENSON'S right to retain his seat; and it seems to me, if we assume honesty on the part of the subcommittee, that fact ought to be worth something.

Mr. President, twice in the lifetime of any man the repute in which he may be held by his fellow men becomes of supreme concern—once when in his youth, looking forward with glowing aspirations, his good name constitutes the spreading and sometimes the only sail which carries the unfilled craft of all his hopes to the open sea of opportunity; and again, when, in his old age, looking back upon generously gratified ambitions in the fading light of evening, with furled sail he slowly creeps into the harbor of eternal anchorage. I know not at which period the loss of an honorable reputation is more sorrowful; but youth has at least the future in which to struggle for rehabilitation, while old age can only stand hopeless and helpless before a tragic and conclusive finality.

Senator STEPHENSON has lived far beyond the span of life to which most men may look forward, and he has carried with him throughout all the years an untarnished character. He has to his credit an unusually successful and honorable business career. He has served his State as legislator, Representative, and Senator with credit and fidelity and unimpeached integrity. Yet a few more days and he must pass on, leaving nothing of permanent value behind him, unless it be the record of an honored and honorable name, and whether he may do that will depend upon the verdict soon to be rendered by this great tribunal.

I began and have continued the consideration of this case with a feeling of deep responsibility, because I have realized that from the decision which we render there can be no appeal. Right or wrong, just or unjust, it becomes final and irreversible. It is within our power to ignore all the rules of evidence and the established principles of law without which justice could not be done. We may render judgment, if we please, regardless of all these, and in no human tribunal can our findings be assailed; but, sir, whosoever shall consciously do this will in the high court of his own conscience forever stand impeached.

Sir, I do not know how it may be with others, but to me it has been a matter of profound satisfaction that after patiently listening to all the testimony and after carefully considering all the facts and the law, I have found myself able with a clear conscience to reach such a conclusion that through no vote of mine will the venerable Senator from Wisconsin be driven from his seat in this Chamber with the great burden of his more than four-score years increased beyond endurance by the crushing weight of dreadful and overwhelming shame.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I yield to no Member of the Senate in sympathy for the Senator from Wisconsin, but much as I sympathize with him in his present unfortunate situation, I can not permit my sympathy to take the place of my duty to my country and my oath of office.

Stripped of the verbiage that obscures and beclouds the issue in this matter, the great question before us is, whether any citizen of the United States can purchase a seat in this body and be permitted to enjoy the object of his purchase. It has been suggested that, notwithstanding this expenditure of a vast sum of money that appalls and shocks the conscience, there is no proof of its corrupt use, and that the guilt of the respondent is not established beyond a reasonable doubt. That, sir, is a rule applicable to the administration of criminal law and has no place in the deliberations of this body. Under the Constitution our sole function as judges is to determine whether a Senator coming with the credentials of a State has secured his place by corrupt means and methods, and whenever the evidence submitted to us justifies our belief that he has secured his place by such means, we are restrained by no other consideration, but are justified in determining that he does not hold his seat by a clear title.

When I read in the report of the committee the declaration that the expenditures made by Mr. STEPHENSON "were in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of Government, which contemplated the selection of candidates by the electors and not the selection of the electors by the candidate," I viewed that statement as one which would meet with the hearty approval of every person familiar with the record; but I have found difficulty in reconciling it with the conclusion reached by the committee—to the effect that Mr. STEPHENSON may nevertheless retain his seat. I can only account for the apparent inconsistency between the statement to which I have just invited the attention of the Senate and the conclusion of the committee because of an error into which, inadvertently, the Senator from Idaho fell when he declared:

It seems from this consideration of the question we must conclude that the direct-primary proceedings can not be held to affect the validity of an election by the legislature.

The evidence, without contradiction, is that $107,000 was put into the primary contest by the Senator from Wisconsin, and the extraordinary proposition has been advanced in this body that, inasmuch as a primary election is unknown to our Constitution, no matter what may have been the conduct of a candidate for public office at the primary, the fraud and the infamy of his conduct can not be held to be sufficient to impeach his title to the Senatorship, which came to him as a consequence of the wrong and the corruption at the initial stage of his effort to secure the office. I am glad to recognize, however, that in the discussion of this question to-day and yesterday scarcely a voice has been raised in vindication of that proposition.

I assert that the true rule, a rule recognized by nearly every Senator who has discussed this question, is that even though a primary contest be unknown to the Constitution, corrupt conduct, the corrupt purchase of influence, will invalidate the title of a Senator when his subsequent election is directly traceable to the result of the primary.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], while agreeing in the conclusions of the report of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], fell into an error, which I think can not be vindicated. It is stated on page 28 of the report:

Mr. STEPHENSON'S campaign managers gave to John W. Stone, the game warden of the State, $2,849.50 for campaign purposes. This was distributed among a number of the deputy game wardens; he retained some portion of it himself, and in testifying before the legislative committee, falsely stated the amount he had paid out.
Section 990–28 (sec. 28, ch 363, 1905) provides:
"No officer, agent, clerk, or employee under the government of the State shall directly or indirectly solicit or receive or be in any manner concerned in soliciting or receiving any assessment, subscription, or contribution, or political service, whether voluntary or involuntary, for any political purpose whatever from any officer, agent, clerk, or employee of the State."

And the comment of the Senators subscribing to this part of the report is as follows:

This statute makes it an offense for any officer, agent, clerk, or employee under the government of the State to solicit or receive any assessment, subscription, or contribution, or political service from any officer, agent, clerk, or employee of the State. It is clear that this statute was not violated by Senator STEPHENSON, since he was not an officer, agent, clerk, or employee of the State. Moreover, the statute makes it an offense on the part of the recipient of the fund only. No offense is committed by the donor.

There is no doctrine better settled in the law of all the States and Nation than that any person aiding, abetting, procuring, or inducing another to commit a crime becomes liable with the principal as an accessory; and, therefore, while it was clearly criminal for Mr. Stone to accept this money from Mr. STEPHENSON for the purpose indicated, Mr. STEPHENSON himself was a party to the wrong and liable to indictment and prosecution under the laws of his own State.

It has been stated during the day by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] that there was no evidence that Mr. STEPHENSON knew of Mr. Stone receiving this large sum of money for the purpose indicated. I call attention to the record, at page 300, where the witness Edmonds states as follows:

Senator SUTHERLAND. When was it you gave Mr. Stone the $2,500, before or after this conversation?
Mr. EDMONDS. After.
Senator SUTHERLAND. After?
Mr. EDMONDS. That is, I think the same day, as I recall.
Senator SUTHERLAND. How did you fix the amount at $2,500?
Mr. EDMONDS. My recollection is that either Senator STEPHENSON informed me, or else Mr. Stone informed me, that that was the amount to be paid him.
Senator SUTHERLAND. Which was it?
Mr. EDMONDS. I can not recall now.
Senator SUTHERLAND. Did you make the arrangement or did Mr. STEPHENSON make it?
Mr. EDMONDS. My present recollection is that Mr. STEPHENSON made the agreement with Mr. Stone; Mr. Stone had seen him.

Mr. President, I do not propose to review the evidence. That has been done by Senators on both sides of this question. I shall not suggest that the Senate of the United States is on trial to-day, but I do say that your vote on the pending resolution will have an influence for good or evil that will survive our terms of service in this body. We may deceive ourselves by a vote to-day. We can not deceive the people of the country. No impartial, untrammeled intellect can review the record in this proceeding without being satisfied that in the primary in the State of Wisconsin in the summer of 1908 there was nothing but a contest of money on both sides.

It has been stated by the Senator from Utah, within a few moments, that the Senator from Wisconsin is a man of large wealth; that he has had an honorable career. In all of his career that is creditable I rejoice. But I tremble for the fate of this Government when it becomes the accepted belief in this country that a man who has accumulated his millions may purchase a seat in this body and be immune to the criticism of the land.

It is not disputed, I apprehend, that were it not for the expenditure of this $107,000 the State of Wisconsin would not be represented in this body to-day by the junior Senator. For more than three years the subject which we are now discussing has been agitated in that Commonwealth. Effort after effort has been made to investigate it. The foulest page in the history of popular government in this country is the record of the Wisconsin primaries in September, 1908. There was a riot of crime and venality and corruption.

What was $107,000 expended for? There were no public meetings. There were no champions of popular causes. There was no discussion of great fundamental principles of government. It occurred to the Senator from Wisconsin that he wanted the distinction of a seat in this body, and he intrusted the procuring of the place to two or three of his friends. It is conceded that at least $107,000 was spent at the primary, nominally to create a sentiment favorable to the gentleman, to accelerate a sentiment that might bring him to the Senate.

I know of nothing more conducive to despair of the future of our country than to have it recognized—and there are many who recognize it now—that however corrupt and foul and venal the means employed to secure it, the holder of a seat in this body may retain it.

It has been suggested that we have not seen the witnesses. At times it is very important, in passing upon conflicting evidence, to see the witnesses. But here we have the conceded fact that this large sum of money was used for this purpose. It is not fair to say that it has been claimed here that its use raises a conclusive presumption that it was improperly used. But, having given Mr. STEPHENSON his opportunity to explain the expenditure, the inference to my mind, from the record as it stands, is that a large part of that money was used for corrupt purposes. Much as I should prefer to see him an honored Member of this body, with his right to a seat unchallenged, I can not vote for his retention.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the principal parties who are deeply and profoundly interested in this proceeding are the Senator from Wisconsin, the Senate itself, and the Nation. Of course, in the consideration of a question which is of such deep significance to any individual, particularly one of our associates, the natural feelings of sympathy and personal regard which affect us constitute a considerable difficulty in the way of a logical and judicial determination of the question. This gives a certain advantage to the individual who is interested. To accentuate that difficulty, the feelings of the committee which investigated the case, and of the Senate, which is now to finally determine it, have been appealed to insistently and persistently and eloquently by counsel for the Senator from Wisconsin and by Senators who have advocated his cause on the floor of the Senate; and this has induced me to consider from the standpoint of the Senator from Wisconsin, if possible, the situation in which he is placed.

I have just listened to the eloquent peroration of the Senator from Utah, describing the effect upon the Senator from Wisconsin in his old age of being excluded from the Senate upon a charge of fraud and corruption in his election. But, Mr. President, it is not the action of the Senate that will fix the estimation in which the Senator from Wisconsin will be held by the people with whom he will have to associate; it is the facts disclosed by the evidence and within the knowledge of those people, his associates.

If the testimony in this case shows, whether altogether through his personal participation or partly through his personal action and partly through that of his agents, that he purchased an election to the United States Senate, or purchased the nomination at a primary which he himself admits was practically equivalent to an election to the United States Senate—because the party which bestowed upon him that nomination was in the overwhelming majority in his State—and the Senate, through any feeling of sympathy or personal regard for the Senator from Wisconsin, should be influenced to decline to find that the election was void because it was purchased, I do not apprehend that it would afford any satisfaction to the Senator from Wisconsin. For the action of the Senate in direct contradiction to the record which has been made in the case would create a feeling of resentment on the part of the people of this country, which would be continually aggravated at every legislative action, at every vote cast, by the Senator who holds his seat by such means. Whatever may be the verdict of the Senate, it is impossible for this body to control the verdict which the people of this country will render upon the evidence in the case. Whether we reach a favorable or an unfavorable conclusion, the case will be decided according to the evidence by the people of this country; and the estimation in which the Senator from Wisconsin will be held will depend upon what he did in this election far more than upon what conclusion the Senate may reach in its formal action of dismissal or retention.

The Senator from Utah has said that the Senators who heard the testimony are in a better situation to come to a conclusion than the other Senators, who were not members of the committee. After reading the conclusion reached by the Senators who heard the testimony, I must say that I listened with some astonishment to the speech of the Senator from Utah upon the floor.

I want to call the attention of the Senate, in order to refresh its memory, to the conclusions reached by the Senator from Utah and the distinguished Senator from Idaho who sits by my side, after having had the privilege of observing the witnesses and determining their credibility, and I want to appeal from the eloquent advocate here who appeals to the Senate not to fix a disgrace upon the aged Senator from Wisconsin to the judicial findings and conclusions of these same Senators who weighed the evidence and heard the witnesses.

The Senator from Utah, the Senator from Ohio, and the Senator from Idaho, the principal advocates of the Senator from Wisconsin in this proceeding, have found and recorded their opinion as follows:

Were it possible to hold that Mr. STEPHENSON was subject to the same restrictions under the laws of Wisconsin as a candidate for a State office, we would feel compelled to enter more fully upon the nature and character of the expenditures made by him and on his behalf during the primary campaign.

The amount of money expended by Mr. STEPHENSON, Mr. Cook, Mr. Hatton, and Mr. McGovern in the primary campaign was so extravagant and the expenditures made by and on behalf of these gentlemen were made with such reckless disregard of propriety as to justify the sharpest criticism. Such expenditures were in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of government, which contemplated the selection of candidates by the electors and not the selection of the electors by the candidate.

Regardless of any statute requiring that strict accounts be kept of money expended by and on behalf of candidates, a candidate and every man representing him should know that public opinion would expect the parties to place and maintain themselves in a position so that if any of their acts were questioned they could justify such acts to the extent of giving every detail in regard thereto.

While I do not believe that the law of Wisconsin could constitute any man a candidate or place him in the position of and under the responsibilities of a candidate for an office over which the State had no control and which was not to be filled under any law of the State, yet I feel impelled to criticize the acts of those in charge of the expenditure of the money of men who are called candidates for the Senate, and especially of Mr. STEPHENSON, in the irresponsible and reckless manner in which they disbursed the money furnished them by Mr. STEPHENSON during the period of the primary campaign.

The failure to keep detailed accounts, the destruction of memoranda, the shifting of records and papers concerning the campaign from one place to another, the adoption of mysterious methods and roundabout ways in regard to matters that might just as well have been performed in open daylight in the presence of the people, would go far toward creating the impression that there was some occasion for Mr. STEPHENSON'S representatives to avoid candor and to obscure conditions.

That is on page 18 of the report of the majority of the subcommittee.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I rise to suggest a correction of the Senator. It is not any part of the report of the subcommittee. It is a part of the individual views filed by me as a member of that committee, and is not a part of the report.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In reply to that, Mr. President, I desire to call attention to page 30 of this document, No. 349. I will not call it a report, although it calls itself a report. The members of this subcommittee were the Senator from Idaho, the Senator from Ohio, the Senator from Utah, and the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HEYBURN. The two Senators from Kentucky.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Were they both on the subcommittee?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER So far as I am advised, they took no part in the proceedings and did not sign any report. At least, one of them did not sign any report.

On page 30 of the same document the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Utah use the following language:

We heartily approve these words of Senator HEYBURN.

They then quote the language which I have just read, which was reported and filed in the Senate by the senior Senator from Idaho, along with the formal report of the committee, and all printed in this document as the report of the members of the committee. The language which I have read is the findings reported to the Senate by at least a majority of the subcommittee.

In addition is the following language, on page 19 of this document:

Were a candidate for a State office in Wisconsin to conduct a campaign in the manner in which the campaign of Mr. STEPHENSON, and of other men who sought election to the United States Senate, were conducted, it would be very difficult to justify such conduct under the laws of the State.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know the Senator would like to be accurate. The report of the committee is found on pages 8 and 9. Nothing beyond that is the report of the committee. It covers about half a page. The Senator has been reading the individual views of members of the committee; but the Senate is not dealing with the individual views of members of the committee; it is dealing with the report of the committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I think that distinction is utterly immaterial. I am reading the views in writing, filed here as a return to the Senate and a report to the Senate by the several members who signed it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Senator will never have an opportunity to vote upon those views. When he votes, it will be upon the report of the committee, and not upon the individual views of the members of the committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My understanding was that when we voted, we would vote upon the motion of the Senator from Idaho; but I do not care, Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. But, Mr. President, let us be fair. The motion of the Senator from Idaho is not directed to the individual views of members of the committee, but is directed solely to the report of the committee, on pages 8 and 9 of the record.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not care whether this finding is called "the individual views of the members of the committee" or whether it is called "the report of the committee." It is at least a statement returned here and signed by a majority of the subcommittee and by the Senators to whom I have referred, who are now defending a seat obtained by methods which they themselves have characterized in the language I have read.

I want, further, to read into the RECORD, in view of the argument which has been made this afternoon by the Senator from Utah, the language reported in writing by the Senator from Utah after he had had the advantage, as he says, of hearing and seeing the witnesses. It is found on page 26 of the report—or of the document, if the Senator from Idaho will pardon me. It is as follows:

We have no sympathy whatever with the expenditure of money in excessive amounts, whether in a senatorial or any other political campaign. That an expenditure of $107,793.05 is an excessive amount to be spent in the candidacy for the office of United States Senator, which pays a salary for six years' service amounting to $45,000, goes without question; that it is demoralizing and should be prevented can not be denied.

That is a part of a statement filed by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not any part of the report of the committee. I refer the Senator from Washington to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 19, that being the day upon which the report was made, where he will find the report of the committee, followed by the motion which I made that the report of the committee be adopted. It contains none of the statements to which the Senator has called attention. It stands under the rules of the Senate as the only and the complete report. If the Senator desires to use it, I have it at hand for his convenience.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I thank you very much, indeed. I probably will have occasion to use it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to his colleague?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I simply want to suggest to my colleague, who probably has it in mind, that in what is called the report, which the members of the committee seem to be so insistent shall be termed the report, there is absolutely no reason given at all for the conclusion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad my colleague has stated that fact. It is true. It is just a bare recommendation without any reason given or any finding of fact or conclusions of law.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is as it should be, Mr. President.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will not stop now at least to discuss the ethics of reports. I do not understand that the Senator from Idaho denies that the language which I have just read is the language of the three members of the subcommittee whom I have named and filed in the document marked Report No. 349. It is not a part of the formal report, as the Senator says, but the views and conclusions of the Senators who made the report.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Washington yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. I happened to express the same views in the remarks I made in support of the report. Had the document which the Senator refers to never existed he would have had the benefit of the wisdom of those views.

Mr. POINDEXTER. They are the views of Senators who have been very diligent in advocating the right of the Senator from Wisconsin to retain his seat. In other words, the Senators argue that a seat acquired in that way is a valid seat; that the Senate ought not and can not protect itself from membership acquired by means which can be characterized in the language which Senators have used, and which I have just read.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington further yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion. He has referred more than once to those who have spoken in support of the report as the advocates of Senator STEPHENSON. He would not like to be termed the "prosecutor" of Senator STEPHENSON. The term "advocate" has no place in connection with this discussion. We are all here speaking as Senators. No one will claim that the record shows that any member of the subcommittee was the advocate of Senator STEPHENSON in the investigation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, I am willing the Senator should criticize that word. I did not intend to use it in any offensive sense whatever. It is simply a word which describes the efforts of a Senator who, as a Senator, of course in a perfectly proper and legitimate way, contends in this forum that the Senator from Wisconsin, notwithstanding the methods which they have so characterized, is entitled to retain his seat—and, of course, if he is so entitled, then any State in the Union can fill seats in this body in the same way.

It so happens, Mr. President, that frequent reference has been made during this debate to the Lorimer case, and that the Senate is now in the unique and, so far as I know, the unprecedented situation of having the validity of the seats of three of its Members formally challenged. One reason why I refer to that is in order to make a comparison of the evidence in a case which has recently been thoroughly discussed in this body. A number of Senators have recorded, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the Journal and the proceedings, that upon the evidence in the Lorimer case their judgment was that the election was invalid.

Now, what is the difference between the Lorimer case and the Stephenson case? One important difference I will state, and I am perfectly free to state it, because I concluded, upon the hearing of the discussion and an examination of the testimony in the Lorimer case, against the validity of his seat, and so voted.

I want to say that the principal difference between this case and that one is that there was a total failure in the Lorimer case to show that the Senator from Illinois personally participated in any way whatever in the corruption of the Illinois Legislature. I believed that the circumstances in the case justified the conclusion that he had knowledge of it, but there was a total failure of evidence, either direct or circumstantial, to connect him with the expenditure of the money or to connect any agent of his with the expenditure of the money in that case. The great question, which was more or less a mystery throughout its consideration, was, Where did the money come from, who furnished it, and what interests were they that sought so diligently to elect a Senator from Illinois?

In the Stephenson case there is no such mystery. There is no such difficulty. It is admitted by the Senator from Wisconsin, both by the statement which he filed and by the testimony which he gave before the committee, that not only was he personally cognizant of all these proceedings, but that the money which was used to corrupt the electorate of Wisconsin was his money; that he personally paid the money to the men who were selected by him to take charge of the various features of his campaign. There is not any contention here that every dollar which was used to perpetrate the act which has been denounced by the majority as well as by the minority of this committee was a portion of the fund which was furnished by the Senator from Wisconsin, his money—paid by him.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho will state it.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator is violating the second section of Rule XIX of this body, which provides that—

> No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] is not under investigation and stands in the same light as any other Member of this body. An offensive reference to him is a violation of the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not hear the language the Senator from Washington used, but the Chair is sure the Senator will not violate any of the rules of the body.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is not my intention to violate any rule.

Mr. HEYBURN. He was in the midst of it and had just uttered the words when I rose and addressed the Chair. It rests with the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not hear them, and the Chair trusts there will be no necessity for raising such a question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will endeavor to comply with the rules. Only in passing, however, I will say that I apprehend it is legitimate in the discussion of an election case to refer to the journals and records of this body in other election cases. That is what I did.

It is contended in this case by those who are defending the Senator from Wisconsin on the claim that his election was a valid election—some of them, at least—that all of the evidence relating to the primary is immaterial. They refuse to consider that. I understand that is the position of the Senator from Idaho. That was practically the sole basis upon which the counsel for the Senator from Wisconsin based his case in the proceedings before the committee—a most elaborate, I think, and artificial and sophistical argument, on the proposition that no attention could be paid to proceedings in a primary election, even though the evidence should show it was corrupt. The Senator from Idaho bases his contention upon the proposition that it had no legal effect upon the legislature, that it was not binding upon the legislature, and consequently had no appreciable or legal effect upon the election of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The same thing may be said, the same argument may be made, against any form of corruption. If the members of the Legislature of Wisconsin had been directly bribed it could be argued that we should pay no attention to evidence of that bribery, because it had no legal effect upon the members of the legislature. We could argue in that case, just as the Senator from Idaho argues in the case of the primary, that we should not pay any attention to the proof of bribery of the members of the legislature, because they were not bound by that bribery.

The importance of the primary election is not in its legal binding effect upon the action of the legislature, but in its persuasive force. In the same way, if money had been used directly with members of the legislature and not legally binding upon them to vote for the man who gave it to them, it would be a persuasive and a corrupting force. So with the primary election. The result was the Senator from Wisconsin became the nominee of his party and was entitled by the party rule, entitled by the statutes of the State, in the regular proceedings to have the votes of the members of his party in the legislature, and it had a persuasive and powerful influence upon the members of the legislature. Can it be logically said that an influence of that kind, an influence which was controlling, although not legally binding, brought about by fraud, brought about by corruption, would not vitiate the election?

I want to call attention very briefly to the kind of argument that is relied upon to relieve the Senator from Wisconsin of the effects of corruption in the primary election. This is reported by the committee as a part of the proceedings before the committee. It seems to be an argument that was made by the counsel for the Senator from Wisconsin. I read from page 21:

> So I submit that, in order to get an equation upon which the Senate must finally pass, you must have the existence of those two factors. The primary is simply advisory and persuasive. If it be true that it is corrupt in its character, and so corrupt as to impregnate the vote cast thereby, then the man who cast the vote is also corrupt when he casts it; and the absurdity of that conclusion simply demonstrates that there is no foundation for the proposition. If advisory and persuasive, you do not get the legal connection that ultimately results in corruption, in casting the vote. I submit it is fundamental that there can not be a corrupt vote honestly and sincerely cast. In order to be corrupt in its result and in its effect upon the result, the man who casts it must participate in the corrupt purpose; otherwise, there is an entire absence of legal connection.

That argument sounds a good deal like some of the scholastic arguments as to how many angels could stand on a needle point; but, as near as I can understand it, the proposition is that although the primary election was absolutely corrupt, and although the legislature should follow its result and vote for the nominee in the primary, yet it would not vitiate the election if members of the legislature did not participate in the corruption. I submit it is unworthy of the Senate to undertake to decide a case of this moment upon any such artificial reasoning.

Another contention, which is repeated over and over again in the debate upon this question, is that the acts of corruption, whatever they were, were perpetrated without his personal knowledge by men who had no authority from the Senator from Wisconsin to do the particular acts they did.

Mr. President, in the first place I do not admit at all that this corruption was without his personal knowledge. One hundred and seven thousand dollars was spent, as I have already said, by his agents. Suppose it was spent with his personal knowledge by men whom he had directed, in many instances, how to spend it; but suppose it was not so spent, and that he had no personal knowledge of the particulars of these expenditures, and that the men to whom he had given large sums of money and had them go out and secure his nomination in the primary had proceeded to bribe the electorate of the State of Wisconsin with the money which he had given them, and the only defense was that he was not present, that he had gone off on a fishing excursion.

I believe that is what he says he did, at least, during a large part of this campaign. Suppose he paid no attention to it himself. Shall the Senate listen to a defense of an election that was brought about by bribery in that way as a valid one, perpetrated by the men he had employed to conduct his campaign, simply because he had no personal knowledge of the particulars in which they had corrupted the electorate? Such a proposition is contrary to common sense; it is contrary to reason; it is contrary to the law; it is contrary to the authorities and the precedents in election cases. On any such reasoning as that, if a man wanted to secure a piece of property and employed an agent to secure it for him, gave him a large amount of money and told him to go and get, we will say, a diamond that he wanted, and the man would go and steal the diamond and put the money in his pocket and bring the diamond back to his employer; if it was sought to recover it his answer would be, "You can not get it back; I did not personally know that it was stolen; it was stolen by my agent; I have it; but you can not recover it, because I did not have personal knowledge of the theft."

I want to call attention very briefly to some authorities upon that proposition, especially with relation to elections, in the work on "The Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Acts," by Ernest A. Jelf. On page 69 there are some illustrations used as to the responsibility of the candidate for acts done by his agents without his knowledge or his specific consent. The author says:

> The position of a candidate at an election is like that of a yacht owner in a race. When the owner goes aboard and finds captain and crew there, the very fact that he consents to sail with them makes them perforce his agents for the purpose of sailing the race in accordance with the laws of the course. And so, where the steersman aboard one yacht thwarts his opponent by declining to give way to the vessel that had a right to keep her wind, or where one of the crew hoists a sail not allowed by the rules of the race, the owner of that yacht is disallowed the prize. This illustration has been frequently approved.

He then cites a number of cases, and proceeds as follows:

> Lord Barcaple, in the Greenock case (1 O'M. & H., 251), distinguished three classes of cases—(1) criminal cases, in which the prisoner must be proved personally guilty; (2) civil cases, in which it is enough if the offense is caused by the person employed by the defendant doing the thing he is employed to do; (3) election petitions, where, it being proved that a candidate is having his election carried on by a committee or certain canvassers, those canvassers do something which, if the candidate is responsible for it, will invalidate the election; and it is held that he is responsible for it in the sense of making the election depend upon it. This statement of the law was approved by Blackburn, J., in the North Norfolk case (1 O'M. & H., 241).
> What has to be proved to constitute agency for this purpose is that the person in question has been intrusted in some way or other by the candidate with some material part of the business of the election, which is performed, or which is supposed to be performed, by the candidate himself.
>
> So, where the respondent intended generally a distribution of coals to the poor as a charitable gift and with a view of making himself popular, but in the hands of those who acted for him it was made the agency of getting votes for him, this was held to be a corrupt act, for which the respondent was responsible, and he was unseated.

Mr. President, in this case there seems to have been no demand, so far as can be judged from the testimony taken by this committee, that the Senator who is involved here should be a candidate in Wisconsin for the United States Senate. So, as he has testified, as shown by the record, he was put to great expense and a great deal of difficulty in securing a sufficient number of names to the petition to nominate him as a candidate in the primary election. In order to do that he hired a large number of men, and paid them at the rate of 5 cents a name for each name they would secure upon his nominating petition. That was the beginning of his campaign some time in July. In the short space of less than two months this entire amount of $107,000—and more than $107,000; more than $108,000—was expended in the election. He personally gave $5,000 to Edmonds. He told Edmonds to take charge of his campaign, and gave him no instructions as to how the money was to be used. The Senator from Wisconsin personally gave $5,000 to Rodney Sacket, and likewise gave him no authority as to how the money should be used. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] says that these are not the men to whom he was referring when he said that, in his opinion, they kept a large part of the money which they received. I do not know upon what basis the Senator from Utah arrives at the conclusion that they did not keep a part of this money. They devoted their time and energy and talents to the campaign; they had complete control of this money; and they never made any accounting for the money, except for a portion of it.

As to the manner in which they expended that part which they did expend, and passing by the proposition that they were bribed, and I shall point out very briefly in a moment that the act of the Senator from Wisconsin in paying this money to these men to procure his election for the United States Senate constituted under the law of Wisconsin an act of bribery, what did they do with the vast sums of money, other than the $5,000 which he paid, which they received from his bankers? One thing that they did with it was to employ a large number of men to go out over the State, and, as the Senator himself says and as the witness Edmonds says, to stir up sentiment for the candidacy of Mr. STEPHENSON, to say pleasant things about him, and to tell people that he was a good fellow.

One man who was employed was a railroad man, who was to work especially among railroad employees. Mr. Edmonds, the man who was given such a fine character in the eulogy of the Senator from Utah, was asked what instructions he gave to this railroad man in spending money among his fellows. He said he gave him no instructions; that he was to use his own judgment. The question was asked him if it was necessary to pay these railroad men money for their support, was he authorized to do that, and the answer was that he was to use his own judgment as to whether it was necessary or not. That is characteristic of the way in which this campaign was conducted.

I want to briefly call attention to and put into the RECORD the statement on page 30 of the Senator from Wisconsin himself as to his intentions as to how this money should be expended. The chairman of the committee put this question:

> Now, you say you do not know what disposition was made of the larger items paid to Van Cleve and Sacket. There is on August 20 an item of $15,000; on August 20 an item of $10,000; on August 31, $2,000; and on September 3, $13,500, paid to Van Cleve. You do not know what he did with that money?
> Senator STEPHENSON. All of that money that was given to Mr. Puelicher and Mr. Van Cleve was to be given to Mr. Edmonds, my manager, as he might need it. That is all they had to do with it.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. What were they to do with this money?
> Senator STEPHENSON. They were to give it to Mr. Edmonds as he needed it in the canvass.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. What was Edmonds to do with it?
> Senator STEPHENSON. He was to carry on the campaign.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by carrying on the campaign?
> Senator STEPHENSON. I might say that you know. You have got to advertise. You have got to get men to work.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by "work," when you say you have to get men to work?
>
> Senator STEPHENSON. To get up sentiment and influence people, if you please, to vote for you.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. How did they influence people to vote for you?
> Senator STEPHENSON. To tell them that you are a good fellow, and so forth, and then to get them out. At the time of our primaries here on the first Tuesday of September the people are very busy. The farmers are very busy, and you have got to induce them to get out. Maybe you have to hire a team or something; I do not know what.

I want to read very briefly from page 65 of the record of the testimony of E. A. Edmonds, the principal manager of Senator STEPHENSON:

> The CHAIRMAN. Now we come to July 20. On July 20, the day after you received the check for $5,000, I find an item, "T. J. Sexton, organizing, C. D. No. 93677, $50." Do you know Sexton?
>
> Mr. EDMONDS. Yes, sir.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. What did he do?
>
> Mr. EDMONDS. He was helping organize in Dane County.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. That is an item that was paid out under your administration, is it, after you had received the $5,000 and had full control and management of the campaign?
> Mr. EDMONDS. But not necessarily from that $5,000.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. I am not inquiring as to the fund from which it was paid. I am inquiring as to the purpose for which it was paid.
>
> Mr. EDMONDS. Yes, sir.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by "organizing," as it is used in this statement?
> Mr. EDMONDS. My recollection is that he was a railroad man, though I am not certain, and that he was sent out and given $50 to see if he could not line up the railroad men for Senator STEPHENSON.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by lining them up for Senator STEPHENSON?
> Mr. EDMONDS. Getting them interested in his election.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. Discussing his election with them?
> Mr. EDMONDS. Yes, sir.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. Paying any money to them for any purpose?
> Mr. EDMONDS. That was up to the man's judgment as to whether that was necessary or advisable in the conduct of the campaign for Senator STEPHENSON'S election.

An army of men were employed and paid money for their services in stirring up sentiment, as it was called, for the Senator from Wisconsin. Among them was a game warden, who was paid, not $2,500, but $2,850, not simply to be expended by him for expenses, but, according to his own testimony, he retained a large portion of that $2,850 for his services in the campaign.

Mr. Edmonds gives a list of the names of some of the men to whom he paid various sums of money, not for expenses, not to be paid out by them, but to be received and kept by them for their support of Senator STEPHENSON, for working for him, for stirring up sentiment for him. This list appears on page 323 of the record, in a paper furnished by Mr. E. A. Edmonds, containing the names of a number of men to whom the amounts stated opposite their names were paid for their services in the campaign, not for expenses, as I have said, but for their employment to aid in procuring the election of Senator STEPHENSON. I desire, without reading it, to have the list printed as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The list referred to is as follows:

E. A. EDMONDS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The election obtained by these means was investigated by a joint committee of the Wisconsin Legislature. A report was made by the senate members of that committee, and thereupon the following joint resolution was adopted by the legislature (record, pp. 2-3):

Whereas the senate committee members of the joint senatorial primary investigation committee and the senate investigation committee have in said report found that ISAAC STEPHENSON did commit acts of bribery and attempted bribery and did commit other acts in violation of the corrupt-practices laws of Wisconsin relating to said matters; and, further, that the managers and agents of ISAAC STEPHENSON in said primary campaign and election and general election and senatorial election did, by acts of bribery and attempted bribery and other acts in violation of the corrupt-practices laws and penal statutes of Wisconsin relating to said matters, obtain for the said ISAAC STEPHENSON votes without which he would not have been elected, and that for such reason the election of said ISAAC STEPHENSON to the United States Senate was null and void, and such election of the said ISAAC STEPHENSON to the United States Senate should be annulled by the United States Senate.

* * * * * * *

SECTION 1. Therefore be it resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the senate and assembly concur in the findings and recommendations of said senate committee members of the joint senatorial primary investigation committee and the senatorial primary investigation committee as by them found and recommended and as above recited.

Mr. President, the principal contention made in this case by the able lawyers who have discussed it is that no law of Wisconsin or of the United States was violated in this campaign. The Constitution of the United States provides:

Each House—

shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

The result of the contention that it is necessary that some law of Wisconsin or some law of Congress be violated before the Senate can, or at least before it ought to, hold invalid the election of one of its Members would be to destroy the effect of that clause of the Constitution. If an election is not to be held invalid; if no Member of this body is to be questioned as to his right to his seat unless he has violated a rule laid down by the Legislature of Wisconsin or some rule laid down by Congress, in which the other House has necessarily to concur, then this body is absolutely deprived of its right to judge of the invalidity or validity of the election of one of its Members. That is the contention which is made by the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Ohio and I think by the Senator from Idaho. The effect of it would be——

Mr. HEYBURN. No; Mr. President, I protest——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not to be charged with any such ridiculous fallacy as that, and remain silent. I made no such contention, and I never heard it made by anybody else.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Did the Senator not hear the argument repeated and reiterated that the Senate ought not to hold invalid this election because no law of Wisconsin had been violated and because no law of Congress had been violated?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not what the Senator said.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I beg the Senator's pardon, that is exactly what I said; and I repeat that the effect of that contention would be to deprive the Senate of the right to pass upon the election of its Members.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator from Washington say that I have taken the position that this seat could not be vacated unless some law of Wisconsin or some statute law of the United States had been violated?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not say that. I said this: That the Senator from Utah took the position that the election either could not or ought not to be held invalid unless some law of Wisconsin or of Congress had been violated.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will permit me just a moment, I think it was conceded by all Senators that the Senate had the power to exclude a Member notwithstanding no law had been violated; but it was argued and reiterated that it ought not to exercise that power unless a rule had been laid down by the Legislature of Wisconsin or by Congress.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. With all due respect to the Senator from Washington, he is utterly mistaken. I never have made any such contention, and I do not make such a contention now. On the contrary, more than once in the course of this debate I have been compelled to deny exactly what the Senator from Washington is saying I have said. I emphatically stated, in reply to the Senator from Iowa more than three weeks ago—and I read the statement to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] the other day—that if the Senator from Wisconsin had been guilty of bribery or corruption, he ought to lose his seat if there were no law of Wisconsin on the subject at all. There is not any doubt about that, and the statement of the Senator from Washington regarding my position is wholly unwarranted.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I beg the Senator's pardon if I have misunderstood him. I should like, however, in that connection, to read some portions of the findings and report of the Senator from Utah as showing the effect which he gives in his discussion to the question of not violating a statute law.

On pages 25 and 29 of the report signed by the Senator from Utah he quotes section 990-28 of the statutes of the State of Wisconsin:

No officer, agent, clerk, or employee under the government of the State shall, directly or indirectly, solicit or receive or be in any manner concerned in soliciting or receiving any assessment, subscription, or contribution, or political service, whether voluntary or involuntary, for any political purpose whatever from any officer, agent, clerk, or employee of the State.

And section 298 of Frear's Election Laws:

Every person who, by bribery or corrupt or unlawful means, prevents or attempts to prevent any voter from attending or voting at any caucus mentioned in this act, or who shall give or offer to give any valuable thing or bribe to any officer, inspector, or delegate whose office is created by this act, or who shall give or offer to give any valuable thing or bribe to any elector as a consideration for some act to be done in relation to such caucus or convention * * * shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, etc.

The Senator from Utah further says, page 27 of his report:

At the time of this primary there was no statute, either State or national, limiting the amount of expenditures. There is no judicial or legislative decision, so far as we are advised, limiting the amount which may be legally expended. Can we, in the face of the fact that the Congress of the United States and the General Assembly of the State of Wisconsin prior to this election failed to limit election expenditures, now arbitrarily determine that because this sum was spent it was illegally and fraudulently expended, and therefore vacate the Senator's seat? Can it be said that the expenditure of such a sum is in contravention of a public policy which must be given the force and effect of a statute? If so, where does public policy draw the line between what shall be a legal and an illegal amount? The situation is unfortunate, but the Congress and the State legislature are to blame for not having limited the expenses by statute. Laws can not be enforced retroactively, and surely this case must be decided in accordance with what the law then was and not in accordance with what the law ought to be.

Then the Senator proceeds to discuss with the most minute particularity whether or not these criminal statutes have been violated.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will allow me—and then I will yield to him—he says that they, being criminal statutes, ought to be given the strictest construction. Of course he means by that, as I understand, that although this is not a criminal proceeding and this not a criminal court the statute ought to be given the strictest construction, as though it were a criminal proceeding here in the Senate in deciding the validity of this election.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was undertaking to show, as I have undertaken to show at other times, that not only had the Senator from Wisconsin not violated a rule of the common law, not only had he not corrupted or bribed any voters, which would justify his losing his seat in the Senate independently of the statute, but that, in addition, he had not violated any statute.

That is a very different thing from what the Senator from Washington said. If the Senator will permit me to call his attention to what I said on that precise subject on March 4, 1912, more than three weeks ago, to be found on page 3021 of the RECORD of March 6, 1912, it was this:

Mr. President, I do not contend that it would be necessary to show that the Senator from Wisconsin had violated any statute of the State of Wisconsin. If it were shown that he had by the use of money corrupted voters, bribed voters, I would not care whether there was a statute of the State of Wisconsin against it or not. I should vote in a case of that kind that the Senator forfeited his right to his seat. But my inquiry of the Senator from Iowa was directed to his statement that the Senator from Wisconsin had violated some statute, and I carefully limited my inquiry, when I made it, by excluding from it any evidence tending to show corruption or bribery, and asked him whether or not there was a violation of the statute of Wisconsin in any other respect, because it seems to have been taken for granted that the Senator from Wisconsin had violated some specific statute of Wisconsin in addition to having corrupted and bribed voters.

So that, as it seems to me, if the Senator from Washington had listened to what I had said then, there would have been little excuse for his imputing to me a view of this matter that I never have entertained and never have stated.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very sorry indeed if I have misunderstood the Senator's position. It seems perfectly clear, however, that when the Senator from Utah characterizes this election as subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government; says that the expenditure of money was excessive, that it is demoralizing and should be prevented; when he characterizes it as an election where, instead of the electors choosing the candidate, the candidate chooses the electors—which can have no other meaning than that as a result of this primary campaign the Senator from Wisconsin selected the members of the legislature——

Mr. HEYBURN. O Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am responsible for the language, and I never supposed anybody would put such a construction as that on it. I was expressing in other language the oft-repeated and old-time statement in regard to the man running after the office or the office running after the man. But—well, I will just let the Senator stand responsible for that construction.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That was not what the Senator said. I am perfectly willing to stand responsible for it upon the language which he used and which the Senator from Utah adopted. I am perfectly willing, also, to accept the statement of the Senator from Idaho as to what his meaning was. I am relying simply upon what he said, and he said that the result of it was that the candidate selected the electors.

Mr. HEYBURN. "Electorate" was the word I originally used, and the printer mixed it up and substituted the word "electors" for "electorate." But I did not say "members of the legislature."

Mr. POINDEXTER. The members of the legislature were the electors, however.

Mr. HEYBURN. So are Senators.

Mr. POINDEXTER. When the Senator from Utah so characterizes this election it seems perfectly clear that there is no ground upon which he can hold it valid other than upon the technical argument he has made that the statutes were not violated. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah further says in his report—and it is the record upon which I base my statement of his position—after pointing out that the Senator from Wisconsin had not violated the statutes which he quoted, he proceeded to set out clearly and very specifically that he did violate another statute. I inferred from reading this report, or as I did read it, that if the Senator from Utah should find some statute which the Senator from Wisconsin had violated in his campaign, he would hold the election invalid.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, that would depend upon what statute it was. The statute which the Senator probably has reference to is that which requires the filing of an account.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is one which I have reference to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That statute required the filing of an account after the election had taken place. Of course I assume that the Senator would not contend that the violation of a statute after an election had taken place could in any manner affect the validity of that election. It would make the person who violated it subject to the punishment provided by the statute, but it could not render invalid something which had already taken place and which was valid.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What I was struck by was the form of the argument of the Senator from Utah. With nice discrimination he argued that the bribery statutes were not violated. He then proceeds to find that the Senator from Wisconsin did violate this statute, but then excuses the effect of it upon this controversy by saying that the statute did not provide for a forfeiture of the office. The language of the Senator is:

The penalty for failing to comply with this statute is a fine only, and it does not provide for the forfeiture of the office.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That was not all that was said; that is one of the things.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator then said:

If it did, the statute to that extent would be unconstitutional, but Mr. STEPHENSON, because of his failure to file a proper account, has violated the statute and is subject to a fine.

That is the report of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Even that is not all of it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am perfectly willing that the Senator shall insert any other part of it that he wishes.

As to the importance of that statute which the Senator from Utah finds was violated by the Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. President, I want to call attention to the words of C. N. Gregory in an article upon "Political corruption," read before the Wisconsin Academy of Sciences, Arts, and Letters in December, 1894. On pages 284 and 285, referring particularly to Wisconsin—Mr. Gregory being a professor in the State university at the time he published this article—he says:

I do not so much value the penalties denounced in these new laws against bribe givers and bribe takers as I value the sworn reports of receipts and expenditures with vouchers, which are wrung from candidates and committees alike after every election. I trust much to these powerful searchlights. I believe, in fact, that the prevalence of truth and justice in the world was assured when on that first day of recorded time God said "Let there be light," and there was light. I remember that the streets of our cities are perhaps quite as much redeemed from lawlessness by the lamp-posts as by the church spires. In politics, where men rise by the formal approval of their fellows, I do not believe that public and confessed corruption can have any continuing hold or advancement.

There was in effect in Wisconsin at the time this primary election took place the following statute:

The following persons shall be deemed guilty of bribery at elections:

* * * * * * *

Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, make any such gift, loan, offer, promise, procurement, or agreement as aforesaid to or for any person in order to induce such person to procure or endeavor to procure the election of any person to a public office, or the vote of any voter at any election, etc.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has attempted to qualify the meaning of that statute by inserting in it the word "corruptly" as being implied by the word "such"; but by reading the statute—I will not take time now to read the preceding sections—it will be found that the statute is not qualified by any such additional language. It is simply a plain provision that any gift of money or valuable thing to any person in consideration of that person's procuring or endeavoring to procure the election to an office constitutes bribery. This entire $107,000 was paid for that purpose, Mr. President, to Edmonds, to Sacket, and to Perrin, and through them, in turn, to all of the subordinate employees who went out through the 71 counties of the State. They were hired men for the purpose of creating sentiment, for the purpose of procuring or endeavoring to procure the election of the Senator from Wisconsin. It is a violation, as plain as in any case I have ever seen, of the statute which I have just read, the penalty for which is imprisonment in the State prison for from six months to two years.

That statute has been construed time and time again. It is simply a copy of the English corrupt-practices act of 1854, which has been perpetuated as a part of the corrupt-practices act of 1883. Very briefly I want to call attention to some of the interpretations that have been put upon this bribery statute, intended—and I think effectively framed—to prevent the carrying of an election by hiring men in large numbers to go out and make the campaign and bring back the nomination or the election by stirring up public sentiment as a consideration for the price they have received.

In Rogers on Elections, on page 281, third volume, he says:

The above proviso applies only to the first five subsections, i. e., to the whole of the second section.

The proviso that the author is referring to is the proviso which was contained in the statutes of Wisconsin, that—

The aforesaid enactment shall not extend or be construed to extend to any money paid or agreed to be paid for or on account of any legal expenses bona fide incurred at or concerning any election.

This section is open to criticism, because it prohibits and so makes certain acts illegal, and then excepts legal expenses, although, necessarily, everything legal is excepted from or not within what is illegal. The section must be read thus: "Every person who shall, etc., shall be guilty of bribery, provided that this enactment shall not extend to any money paid, or agreed to be paid, for or on account of any expenses bona fide incurred at or concerning any election, and provided such expenses are not illegal on some other ground than this prohibition."

* * * * * * *

The committee reported that a voter was bribed, by the offer of 2 guineas for cart hire, by an agent of the sitting member, and avoided the election.

Citing cases:

A present, office, etc., given, offered, or promised before an election to a voter, or to anyone on his behalf, or to any other person supposed to have influence over him, without any stipulation as to his vote, or even the endeavor or promise to endeavor to procure any such, will be taken prima facie to be bribery.

* * * * * * *

The gist of the offense before voting is the inducement to a voter to vote or refrain from voting. If this exists, the ignorance or honesty of the man who offers, or of him who takes, is immaterial.

The following is applicable to a primary election:

But where they are part of one political contest, and the corruption at the municipal election is either intended to operate upon the parliamentary one, or that is the necessary result of what was done at the municipal election, the parliamentary election will be avoided for the corruption at the municipal election.

That is on page 284.

Loans of money to a voter, or a person likely to influence him, are placed on the same footing, as regards the lender, as absolute gifts.

* * * * * * *

The question as to whether employment amounts to bribery is one of fact. In deciding such question regard must be had to the nature of the employment, the number of persons employed, whether they are voters or not, and the amount of the payments.

Office or employment, whether temporary or permanent, if not given bona fide, is bribery, * * * and whether it be given to a voter or a third person will be immaterial, if it can be proved that the receiver influenced the voter and that the giver meant him to do so.

There are a number of cases dealing with the giving of refreshments, which are particularly applicable to this election, where one witness testified that he spent over $150 in one day in saloons, another witness testified that he received $305 and spent it in saloons, and another witness testified that they bought kegs of beer and distributed them through the country, to be given to the voters, and that that was generally done in the State of Wisconsin.

Some contention, I understand, has been made by one Senator that, even though there were bribery at this primary election, it would not vitiate the election unless the entire 9,084 voters had been bribed. That is entirely contrary to every assumption, I think, that this body has proceeded upon in election cases, and contrary to the decisions of the courts. Under the English corrupt-practices act Parliament is not the judge of the violation of that act; and the election cases are not tried in Parliament, but are tried in the courts. Consequently there are a large number of decisions which explain and interpret this statute, which is a part of the laws of Wisconsin. Among others is this decision:

A single act of bribery, however trifling the amount, may avoid an election.

That is on page 293 of the work from which I have just quoted.

Very briefly, Mr. President, I want to read, upon the general principles involved, just one paragraph from the case of Scofield v. The Milwaukee Free Press Co., One hundred and twenty-sixth Wisconsin, on page 85, simply as indicating a judicial view of the magnitude of the interests involved in this proceeding.

Sweeping aside all of the technical refinements urged by appellants, such as the absence of any express understanding with legislative candidates that they would favor the contributor, or of any showing—

That is particularly pertinent in view of the testimony which shows that the Senator from Wisconsin personally paid sums of money to three men who were candidates for the legislature.

I have not taken time to review the authorities, but I will simply state that when these cases are brought into court the courts will not accept any such defense, but hold that the payment of the money and its acceptance by a candidate will be held to be done for the purpose of influencing the election, although he may come in and say it was not for that purpose. So this court says:

Sweeping aside all of the technical refinements urged by appellants, such as the absence of any express understanding with legislative candidates that they would favor the contributor, or of any showing whether he expected they would use his contribution for legitimate campaign expenses or otherwise, we can not doubt that the charge of using money in large quantities in the hope and expectation of thereby promoting his own candidacy for the United States Senate is a most degrading one to make against any public man. Such an act is an assault upon a most essential principle of popular government, which, if to be successful, must assume the free selection of officials on grounds of fitness. It pretends a superiority before the law of the corrupt man of wealth over the man of ability and integrity who, either from poverty or principle, is debarred from similar means of securing support. It evinces a willingness to corrupt the legislature and dangerous looseness of morals.

The testimony in this case shows that one Perrin, an attorney at law, received $5,000, and that out of that he retained at least $500 for his own services.

W. S. Stone received $2,849.50. According to his testimony, he retained $600 of it for his own services.

So it was with numbers of other men to whom this money was given. They did not expend it; they kept it for their own services, and by its means their support and their activity in this election were bought.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I want to say that the foundations of the Government depend upon the purity of elections. Of course, I realize the difference of opinion as to how extensive the rights of the people to vote in the election of their officers should be, but with all these, whether those who believe in a strictly representative government by simply a few of the people or those who believe in a liberal exercise of the powers of government by the people themselves, under any form, whether in a democracy or in a republic, the perpetuity of its institutions depends upon the freedom and the purity of elections.

An undoubted fact in this case is that at the primary election in Wisconsin the nomination of the Senator who now sits from that State was brought about by the use of money. The only parallel that could be exercised would be the use of force, and I submit, Mr. President, that the case under consideration is just as dangerous to our institutions, just as injurious to the respect which it is necessary to preserve among the people for the laws which are made in these bodies by the men who are chosen. These men who vote, and cast frequently the determining vote, making laws affecting the property, the well-being of the entire Nation, menace our institutions just as much from the use of money in polluting and corrupting the ballot box as though a military force should stand at the polls herding the voters and directing them for whom to cast their votes.

A brief sentence from Mr. Justice Miller, when he was upon the Supreme Court, is as follows:

The two great natural and historical enemies of all republics are open violence and insidious corruption.

And the writer of this pamphlet, entitled "Political Corruption and English and American Laws for its Prevention," adds:

And in the order in which the judge names them they menace the freedom and purity of the ballot, the chief support of republics.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to state briefly my position regarding this vote.

I shall vote to sustain the report of the committee. I have for many years stood for all the various measures of reform that relate to elections, legislation, and administration. I have stood for the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, except so far as it relates to judicial officers. I have stood for the direct primary. I have stood for laws correcting the evil practices regarding elections.

The act complained of here were committed four years ago. Since that time public sentiment has crystallized regarding practices which were not condemned by the common law, and which were not condemned by the statutes of many of our States, and which were not condemned by any act of Congress. Since that time we have put upon the statute book laws, both State and National, which do condemn the practices that were not in violation of law four years ago.

So far as I am concerned, whilst I condemn these practices and think they should be corrected by law, and have stood for the laws, National and State, which have corrected them, and am willing to support laws which will further correct them, I am unwilling to judge the acts of fours years ago either by the political or the moral standards of to-day or to condemn them by the laws of to-day. To do that would be to make the laws, both National and State, which have since been enacted, retroactive in their operation.

I shall therefore vote with the committee in its report regarding the seat of Mr. STEPHENSON.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I shall trespass on the time of the Senate but a moment. I had intended to speak at some length upon the question before the Senate, but on account of the lateness of the hour I shall not do so.

I only want to say that I, too, with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], in the years of the past have stood for primary elections. I have stood for the purity of the ballot. I have stood for popular government. I propose, when I cast my vote on this question, to vote in accordance with the things that I have advocated on the stump and in the campaigns of the past.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not know whether it is in order to offer the amendment, but if it is in order I desire to move an amendment by inserting, after the word "declared," the word "not."

Mr. HEYBURN. That has been voted on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that is the question voted on yesterday and that such an amendment would be simply voting again on the precise question voted on yesterday. Therefore the Chair thinks the amendment would not be in order.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] that the report of the committee be adopted, and that ISAAC STEPHENSON be declared entitled to a seat as Senator from the State of Wisconsin in the United States Senate. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. He is absent, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). Upon this question I am paired with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I transfer that pair, with his consent, to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], from which, upon this vote, I have been released. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. DIXON (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. I understand if he were present, he would vote "yea." I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and I vote "nay."

Mr. STONE. I think it due to state, in this connection, that my colleague [Mr. REED] if present would vote "nay."

Mr. DIXON. I did not understand the statement of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WARREN. He stated that his colleague if present would vote "nay."

Mr. DIXON. I understood that if the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] were present, he would vote "nay," and that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], with whom I am paired, if present, would vote "yea." I therefore transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Texas to the junior Senator from Missouri, and vote "nay." I ask the senior Senator from Missouri if that is his understanding as to how his colleague would vote if present.

Mr. STONE. That is correct.

Mr. BURNHAM (when Mr. GALLINGER'S name was called). The senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. If the senior Senator from New Hampshire were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] and vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I am paired for this vote with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. If he were present he would vote "yea," and if I were at liberty to vote I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEA. The senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] is seriously ill. I do not know how he would vote. He is so ill that I have been unable to communicate with him.

Mr. BRADLEY. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR], from which I have been released. I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS. Some one announced a transfer to the Senator from Kentucky without mentioning the name. I should like to ask what Senator from Kentucky it is?

Mr. CHILTON. The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER].

Mr. MYERS. Thank you.

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 34, as follows:

So Mr. HEYBURN'S motion "that the report of the committee be adopted and that ISAAC STEPHENSON be declared entitled to a seat as Senator from the State of Wisconsin in the United States Senate" was agreed to.

Upon the announcement of the result, there was applause in the galleries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Applause in the galleries is not permitted. The Chair trusts that visitors in the galleries will eventually understand that they are there as guests of the Senate and subject to the rules of the Senate, and that the rules of the Senate prohibit visitors in the galleries from expressing their approval or disapproval of what takes place upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m., Wednesday, March 27, 1912) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 28, 1912, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 27, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who art supremely great and good, our God and our Father, source of all our longings, hopes, and aspirations, kindle within our hearts a sacred flame which shall burn brighter and brighter as the years come and go until we shall have reached the light of the perfect day in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a privileged report (No. 455) from the Committee on Ways and Means, reporting back the bill H. R. 22195, a bill to revise the wool schedule.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, at this time it would be subject to a point of order, but I shall not make any point of order against the report under the circumstances.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is glad that the gentleman from Illinois made that remark, because it is the desire and the intention of the Chair to carry out the plan for Calendar Wednesday in perfect good faith.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I recognize, Mr. Speaker, the fact that a privileged report would be subject to a point of order this morning if anybody desired to make it, but I think to expedite business it is proper to allow privileged reports to be made on Calendar Wednesday, and later on in the session there will be conference reports offered for the purpose of being printed under the rule, and it seems to me that it would be proper to allow them to come in, as long as there is no objection.

Mr. MANN. I think it is perfectly proper that this report should be made now.

The SPEAKER. All of these rules are made, of course, to expedite business.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I present the minority views upon the bill revising the wool schedule, and ask that they be printed along with the majority report (H. Rept. 455, pt. 2).

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 22195) to revise the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The bill, together with the report and minority views, will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand that copies of the bill H. R. 22195, just reported, are exhausted in the document room, and that there are no copies for Members. I desire to ask unanimous consent that there may be a reprint.

Mr. MANN. That is not necessary. The document room has authority to order any number of copies that it wants, 1,000 at a time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wanted to be sure that there would be enough copies for Members.

Mr. MANN. They will print them without an order of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I did not quite catch the statement of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I said that the document room had authority to order a reprint of a bill, 1,000 at a time.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if he desires to make any suggestion as to the time when he will call up this bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I propose to take it up as soon as the public business of the House will allow me to do so. There is a bill pending before the House, the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, and I do not desire to interfere with that. When that is out of the way I hope to have an opportunity to call up this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama withdraws his request for a reprint.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the bill S. 3367. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the unfinished business is the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 3367. An act to amend section 2291 and section 2297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to homesteads.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose last Wednesday they had under consideration an amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 16, on page 3, add the following:
"If any entry is made for land which, though not reserved at the time, is ascertained by the Secretary of the Interior to be chiefly valuable on account of merchantable timber upon it the entry may be canceled within six months of its date."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin last Wednesday is an amendment relative to the timber lands of the country. I do not think at this time it is necessary, either for myself or any Member of the House, to debate whether or not this amendment is or is not a good amendment. For the last 50 years the homestead laws have been in force. At the time they were made they were made for the humid sections of the United States where we have rainfall enough to make lands valuable. For 50 years they have been culling out the good lands by homestead entries and land grants—the lands that have rainfall enough to raise crops—until the only lands left are in the semiarid or arid parts of the West, where it is difficult to carry on agriculture. They need a change in the land laws, and this bill grants them that relief. For the last 10 years we have increased in population from 75,000,000 to 92,000,000, and still the number of homesteads have decreased in the last year 33⅓ per cent. It is estimated from figures not well controverted that about 125,000 families went to Canada last year and took up land. It was the judgment of your committee that the law ought to be so modified as to residence and be so modified as to the length of time that they must live on the land from five to three years, so that our people might not leave us, but, on the contrary, would stay with us.

This bill merely eases up on the length of time necessary for residence from five years to three years, and merely makes a few changes in regard to leave of absence. Whether the gentleman's timber amendment be a good or a bad amendment, the gentleman from Illinois and the committee agreed last Wednesday that we would provide for putting every part of this bill into conference by moving to strike out everything after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the bill as agreed to in this House.

Therefore it would give us an opportunity in the conference for the Secretary to come before us, for the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to come before us, for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and those other gentlemen who are interested in the matter, and we could there work out a comprehensive bill that would be a bill which would really accomplish what the House and the committee sought to do. I again repeat it is not necessary at this time to debate whether this be a good or a bad amendment, because the bill as passed by the Senate, the bill as passed by this committee, as far as we have gone, makes no change in the timber and stone act, makes no change in the mineral laws of this country, but merely relates to the length of time of residence. Therefore I submit to adopt the amendments that are purely foreign to this particular line of legislation would be unwise at this time, and I hope the committee will vote down this amendment, not as any rebuke to its author or not necessarily as the view of the House that it may or may not be wise, but because of the proposition that this is no time to encumber a remedial piece of legislation, which, I think, this entire House agrees is necessary. We have separate statutes on timber and stone entries; we have rigid mineral laws; we have passed rigid withdrawal bills; the forestry has been extremely active; practically all the timberland has been withdrawn.

In any event, this is no place to legislate on every conceivable subject that can be conjured up.

It is apparent something should be done. This bill ought to pass, and it ought not to be burdened too much with amendments, or foreign amendments, whether they be good or bad amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I am not especially interested in this particular amendment. The other two amendments offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] I believe were good ones. I voted for both of them. I think they ought to have been included in this bill, and I speak here as a friend of this legislation. There is no man here who is more anxious to see this bill enacted into law than I. If we reject all of these amendments—harmless some of the gentlemen proclaim, but, on the other hand, claimed by others to be of great importance—I believe we would jeopardize this legislation. I regret very much that we did not put into this bill the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] regarding the mineral proposition, and if I can get recognition from the Speaker I intend to move to recommit the bill when the proper time comes so as to provide for that amendment. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] says that we are going to send this entire bill into conference. He comes very near saying that all of these amendments are going to be put in in conference. If that be true, why not put them in now? This particular amendment, I think, is of the least importance of any. It may be that the importance of the other two is overestimated, but it certainly will not damage any honest homesteader in any respect if we at least add to this bill the proposition regarding mineral deposits.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman, coming from the State he does, I know is familiar with the land laws. I therefore want him to admit, at least, that at the time the homesteader makes final proof he must both himself and by his witnesses declare that there is no mineral on the land. That is a part of his final proof.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that is true, and I am not, as far as I am concerned, particularly arguing that this amendment is necessary. I would support the bill without it. I do not know that I would urge it particularly, but the gentleman himself practically admits that the amendment will not do any damage, and that eventually it is going to be put in in conference. Why not do it here? It will not hurt the honest homesteader if that provision is put into the bill.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman not think if it should be engrafted in this bill as a part of the general homestead law it more properly should be presented as an amendment to other sections of the homestead law?

Mr. NORRIS. That may be true.

Mr. MILLER. And not engrafted onto these two sections?

Mr. NORRIS. It may be that there is some place where it would be more appropriate, but I answer the gentleman from Minnesota and the other gentlemen who are opposing this by repeating their own words, when they tacitly admit that these amendments are going to be considered in conference, and that the Secretary of the Interior is going to be heard, and that we will make a new bill out of it and put them in.

Mr. MILLER. I do not mean to concede that I think this amendment ought to be placed in this bill in conference or in any other place. I do not understand that other gentlemen so agree.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand, however, that this agreement which has been more or less talked about a week ago to-day and to-day practically concedes that.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, no; no.

Mr. NORRIS. And I understand also that unless some provision of this kind be put into the bill, the Secretary of the Interior, who represents th President in the matter, will be in favor of the President vetoing it, and it may be that the President, following the advice of his Secretary of the Interior, may veto the bill if these provisions are not put in. As a friend of the bill I do not want to take any chances in nullifying the bill here by having it eventually defeated when we can meet the proposition by putting in an amendment that of itself is good, and that will do nobody any harm.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman, if he is quoting my statement or any statement that I have heard here I think he quotes it too broadly when he says that these amendments have been agreed to or will be agreed to at all.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not say they have been, but I draw my inference from what the gentleman has said, that at the close of this debate he is going to offer the entire bill as an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the bill which this committee will perfect, so that it can go into conference. There can be no other object in doing that than permitting such amendments to come in, and if I knew they would come in and it would be fixed up in conference so that it would meet the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the President upon these matters I would not have any objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened very carefully to all the debate which has been had in connection with this bill, and somehow or other I have received the impression that the men who represent the Western States which are to be affected by this bill seem to think that nobody else in the United States has any interest in the public lands of the United States, but that all of the States except the States in which these homesteaders are to be affected should keep quiet and not enter into a discussion of the questions that pertain to the homestead land laws.

I am of the opinion that everybody in the United States has an equal interest in these public lands, and I have long since believed there ought to be something done to protect the minerals and the timber, and the granting of the title deed to a homestead for agricultural purposes ought not to carry with it the ownership of the minerals in the land or the timber on the land. The amendments offered, one of which is now pending, certainly seem to me to be in the interest of the public. It seems to me we ought to enact these amendments into the law. It may be that this is not the proper place to put these amendments; that this is not the proper bill on which to engraft them; but it looks to me as if a bill which is for the purpose of granting titles to those who wish to homestead lands in the United States owned by the Government ought to be a good place to place conditions upon the titles that are to be granted to the people who want the homestead. I see no reason on earth why this House or this committee should not consider every phase of the bill. Why should it be necessary to send it to conference to improve it? Is it the fact that the men who are here do not know as much about how to legislate as those who will be on the conference, or is there something to go into the bill that ought not to be given to the membership of the House until it comes back from the conference? I am opposed to this agreement to enter into a conference on questions that ought to be considered before the body where the bill is pending. I think that if there is any information in connection with this legislation it ought to be given to us. I think you will find men enough here who have brains enough to shape the legislation as it ought to be shaped, and I think that we make a great mistake when we vote down every amendment seeking to conserve the rights of the Government in the public lands. We have already done more of that than we ought to have done. If the Government had an interest in the mineral lands throughout all the States of the Union to-day, we would not have to levy taxes on most of our people to maintain the Government. Now, the land which is left that is owned by the Government ought to be protected by the Government, and such legislation should be enacted as will reserve to the Government for all time to come all the minerals and the timber upon the public lands of the United States, and it should never be granted to any private individual or corporation except upon conditions which will inure to the benefit of coming generations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, in all suggested legislation bearing upon land and homestead laws there are two markedly different opinions—the eastern view, which is very largely shared by the persons who hold to the modern notions of conservation, and the western view, that is shared by those who believe that the Federal land reserves form entirely too large a part of their States. It was perfectly apparent in this House last Wednesday—and, I think, in the body at the other end of the Capitol, when this bill was under discussion—that the whole country wants the homestead laws liberalized. There seems to be few, if any, dissenting voices in this House on the proposition to change the five-year term to three years. Now, since the Members are in accord upon this basic proposition, I believe—and I speak as a friend of the measure—that it is very inexpedient to confuse the main issue by any disagreement on the matter of utilities outside of agriculture. The desire to liberalize the statute is based upon the idea of getting more people upon the western lands. They go there presumably for the purpose of farming. The people who have been opposed even to liberalizing these laws have been dominated by the fear, more or less widespread, that many of these alleged homesteaders go there for the purpose of mineral exploitation, the exploitation of timberlands, and other things. We all want the three-year law adopted and passed, and I believe that the western Members and the members of this committee, in large part, are making a mistake in opposing these amendments which are now suggested. I think that all utilities except that of agriculture should be held by the Government.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, under the understanding which was reached on the floor of the House some days ago this bill will probably go to conference on the entire bill. I voted for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin. Those amendments were amendments prepared by the Secretary of the Interior, at my request, in reference to this bill. The Secretary of the Interior, reporting upon this bill originally, suggested a number of changes which should be made in the bill or amendments which should be inserted in it. I made a request that the Secretary might send the gentleman from Colorado in charge of this bill a statement of those things which he considered absolutely essential to go into this bill, and the amendments offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin were a portion of those propositions. If this bill goes into conference on the entire bill, I think the understanding is the conferees will meet with or hear from the Secretary of the Interior and the Land Office and endeavor to agree upon a bill which will be satisfactory, both to the House and the Senate and the administration of the land laws. For instance, yesterday the President sent a message to us calling attention to the fact that the entry of potash deposits was subject to private entry and were not excepted, and no provision was made for the withdrawal of lands containing such deposits, as there clearly ought to be. I hope that when this bill comes back from conference it will contain something upon that subject. Gentlemen say that this is not a bill upon which to insert these items, and yet if they ought to be inserted, in the judgment of Congress, in the end, this bill is before us, and we had just as well insert them here as anywhere, as long as they relate to the subject matter of the bill; and the subject matter of the bill covers the entire public domain so far as it is not withdrawn from entry. I think that in inserting those provisions, which I hope and believe will be inserted in conference, so far, at least, as they are considered necessary by the Secretary of the Interior, in whose judgment I have great faith, that they will be put in in such manner as to accomplish the purpose in connection with the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. MILLER. It does not seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that the friends of this measure before us have much of a quarrel with those who are offering amendments and in some way opposing the bill. I do not think there is anybody in the House who will take issue with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] in what he said respecting the interests of the public at large in the public domain. The people in the States of Illinois, Maine, New York, and Pennsylvania have an interest in the public domain in Minnesota, in Nebraska, in California, or in any other State, of course. It may be, however, that some of us who live in public-domain territory, having had experience on the frontier and having had an opportunity to see the workings of the men who have gone as pioneers and who are doing the pioneer work, may know a little bit more about their needs and about that which will be beneficial to them and to the public domain and to the Nation at large than those equally interested, equally public-spirited, who lack those opportunities of investigation and information.

I take no issue with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in the position he has taken with respect to the amendments that he favors. I do take issue, however, with him in this, that this is no place for their consideration. And why? For a long time we have been believing, and now we are ready to act, I think, on that belief, that the period of residence of a homesteader upon the land should be diminished from five years to three years. We have that definite concrete proposition before us for consideration and action. Let us now consider that, and let us vote upon it. Let us not encumber it with a lot of material that is, perhaps, relevant in a sense, but which, strictly speaking, has no direct bearing upon this question and the one thing upon which we are agreed. It may be that the Secretary of the Interior, a gentleman for whom we all have great respect, thinks that the general homestead law could be improved by these various amendments which have been mentioned, but he certainly has not said, and he can not say, that they have any particular bearing upon the matter of reducing the period of residence from five to three years. He has not said, and he can not say, that if we lessen the time from five years to three years we shall have done anything to the injury of the public domain without accepting and engrafting thereon these various amendments. Let them come in their own time and occupy the attention of the House fully and completely, and then let them be decided.

I will state, Mr. Chairman, that I am not in a position to have any opinion at this time respecting the amendment now offered, as to whether I should favor it or be against it. Yet I know that in my own State there is probably as much public domain that may be affected by this, having possibilities of pine and minerals, as any other State in the Union. I for one want to see the natural wealth of the Nation conserved, but I do not want to see a homesteader handicapped, see him so hampered by regulations, see him so hampered by restrictions, that when he goes to get for himself a little piece of land on the frontier he is absolutely appalled by the obstancles that confront him, and in the majority of cases withdraws from the contest because he is unequal to it.

Mr. NORRIS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to suggest to the gentleman that the pending amendment has nothing to do with minerals.

Mr. MILLER. Very likely. Mr. Chairman, this relates to forests, which are in the same category, so far as my district is concerned. I would like to say one word on the matter of timberland. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman has some more time. Let him go ahead.

Mr. MILLER. As I understand this amendment, it withdraws or puts a restriction upon the title to the timber upon land. Now, certainly, I think the friends of that amendment will admit that it should go no further, and probably does go no further, than to withdraw and restrict the title where the land is particularly valuable for timber, and that is exactly the law to-day. The lands have all been classified, including the Indian lands that ultimately have become subject to homestead entry, in the public domain in my State and other States as well; and it is now a well-established fact, because it has been the law for several years, that where the land is principally valuable for timber it is not subject to homestead entry. The timber is sold separately, and the land, later on, opened up to homestead entry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate be closed on this section and all amendments thereto in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks unanimous consent that debate be closed on this section and all amendments thereto in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FERRIS. How much time does the gentleman want, two minutes?

Mr. LAFFERTY. I would like to have five minutes. I asked leave to be heard on this last Wednesday. I was deferring then to the older Members.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. McCALL. I would like to have two minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. I hope debate will be closed as quickly as possible. We debated all last Wednesday on this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be wise to have all stricken out after the enacting clause of this bill, so that unlimited discretion or jurisdiction practically should be given to the conferees. But there is nothing at all inconsistent with that program in adopting the amendments which are proposed by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] on his motion to recommit the bill.

I think that the House should express its opinion in favor of reserving from a homestead entry all these coal and mineral and timber rights. I am entirely willing to give better terms to the man who enters for the purpose of making a homestead, to reduce the time from five years to three years; but he is not entering on his homestead for the purpose of securing mineral rights, and I think the House should avail itself of the opportunity of declaring in favor of the reservation of the mineral rights and water powers from the entry.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I must beg pardon for butting in here at this time, but I introduced in this House a bill just along the lines of the pending bill, although the Senate bill was the one that came in. Yet the committee has followed my views closely, and I am afraid that my child will be so disguised by these various amendments that I will not know it when it comes out, and therefore, moved by filial affection, as well as for the public good, I hope all these amendments will be voted down.

The amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and that of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] seems to be covered generally by existing law. That is apropos of what was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL]. Those matters are all provided for by general statute. I represent a district that, I think, has more land in it now thrown open to public entry under the homestead act than possibly is represented by any other Member upon this floor; and inasmuch as it has been intimated that we of the West are in league with large corporations, and with people who are seeking to gobble up the public domain, I want to say that that is not a fact. There is no such influence behind this measure, and the mind of every Member on this floor ought to be disabused of that idea. What we are interested in, especially in Colorado, where nearly one-third of our public domain has already been withdrawn and thrown into forest reserves, and possibly forever withdrawn from public entry as well as from taxation, is to have more home makers in that State; and the only way we can get them there is to give a shorter number of years in which to prove up upon their homesteads and on other better terms. To-day there is no more irrigable land in the West, except that which can be irrigated by the expenditure of very large sums of money for the storing of water. The land underneath the natural flow of water has been disposed of, so that now, instead of a poor man being able to take up a homestead under present laws and regulations, it is a rich man's proposition. I will yield the floor to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] in a moment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I do not want the floor, but a Senator was here talking to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], the colleague of the gentleman now speaking, and he spoke to me, and I could not refuse to respond to the Senator's remark. I beg the pardon of the gentleman from Colorado for interrupting him.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I was going to say that it is only a rich man who can now take up a homestead and live upon it for five years. He must have an income.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have leave to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] have five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts (from his seat). I object.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I only want to say that the irritability of my friend from California——

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made to a further extension of the gentleman's time.

Mr. GARRETT. I make the point of order that no Member rose in his place and objected.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts (rising). I object.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the purpose of this measure to liberalize the homestead laws. I have, however, thought it proper for the House to consider suggestive amendments which have been carefully prepared by the Secretary of the Interior, under whose department these laws will be administered. This law purports to be patterned after the Canadian law, in so far as the time is concerned. It does not, however, follow the Canadian law in respect to its administrative features and the reservations which have been embodied in the amendments which have been offered on the floor.

I realize the force of the arrangement that has been made of having these matters considered in conference, but the questions having arisen upon the floor of the House, the action of the House might in conference be considered as expressive of the views of the House.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield for a question?

Mr. PICKETT. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to say that I am always interested in what the gentleman says, and we think alike on a great many things. What I wanted to suggest to him is that, as he knows, being a member of the committee and being familiar with the land laws, there is a separate statute which deals with the timber and stone entries, and this act in no way changes that; and I wondered if it would not be satisfactory to the gentlemen to let that statute be considered as a separate matter, in order that we may not encumber this one relief measure for the homesteaders of the West.

Mr. PICKETT. I was not speaking particularly to the pending amendment. If we pass these various amendments, they will be suggestive to the conferees of the views of the House. I want to read an extract from a letter which I have received from the Secretary of the Interior relative to one of the amendments which have been offered—the one reserving the water-power rights to the Government—because it seems to me that the very object which the Secretary has in mind is to aid the development of our western country. He says:

The policy in this country has been for the Government to withdraw entirely from homestead entry lands which are believed to have a value for the development of water power or for irrigation, especially for reservoir sites. In the nature of the case, much of the land thus withdrawn may not be developed for water power or irrigation purposes for a considerable period of time, and some of it may never be so developed. Nevertheless, under the existing law the public interests can not be adequately protected except by prohibiting homestead entry. In many instances homesteaders would be glad to enter the land subject to the reservation of the right to the Government to take over, for itself or its grantee, such portions of the land as may hereafter be required for irrigation or water-power projects. This in no manner raises the question as to whether the State or the Nation has title to the water; but merely protects the public interest in the land necessary for the effective development and use of the water. If the pending bill is amended so as to provide for such a reservation, it will be possible for the Government to throw open to homestead entry considerable portions of the public domain which must otherwise remain tied up under reservations for water power or irrigation purposes.

Now, it seems to me that the position which the Secretary takes is a very plain and logical one, and is in the direct interest of the development of this western territory. The other amendments are of similar character. If adopted, they would go to conference for consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Oregon yield for a moment? I want to ask unanimous consent to close debate in six minutes and give the gentleman from Oregon five minutes of that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that debate on the paragraph close in six minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I desire to say in the very beginning, that while I am from the State of Oregon, one of the largest public-land States in this Union, I fully concede to every other Member, no matter from what part of the country he may come, as much right to participate in this discussion and in this legislation as I have. I concede that every Member here has the right to express himself on the pending amendment. I do not take very much stock in the shunting of these different propositions off to conference committees when they have once been brought up on the floor and anything like a thorough opportunity has been had for expression of opinion by Members of this House.

But I want you, if you will be so kind as to do so, to bear with me one minute on the vital question involved in the pending amendment.

All of the valuable forest lands of this country are already in the forest reserves. We have 190,000,000 acres in forest reserves in the United States. They are not subject to homestead entry. This bill in no way affects the forest reserves of the United States. Beyond that, as a further safeguard, the distinguished Member from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT] introduced, and this House passed, a bill a year ago, authorizing the President of the United States, without authority from Congress, to withdraw any additional public lands in the United States for the purposes of conservation, and the President has exercised his right under that Pickett withdrawal bill and many other lands in the West have been withdrawn from homestead entry.

Now, what does this amendment mean? It means that in addition to all these safeguards you are going to say that when we deal out a little liberality with one hand to the homesteader with the other we will prevent him hereafter from entering on any land west of the Cascade Mountain Range in Oregon, Washington, and California.

As far as I am concerned, as far as my colleague from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] is concerned—and I have discussed this matter with him this morning—we would rather you would leave the homestead laws as they are than to withdraw from homestead entry and deprive the homestead settler from the right to go upon the lands in western Oregon, where we have a God-given climate, beautiful scenery, and the most delightful place to live in the world.

Now, why put in this bill a provision preventing the homesteader from filing upon any land that in the opinion of the special agent is chiefly valuable for timber? The largest bodies of timber are already in the forest reserves. The Pickett withdrawal bill authorizes any large bodies of timber that may be found in isolated tracts hereafter to be withdrawn. Why not leave the lands open to homestead entry that are now subject to such entry and not further withdraw them from the reach of the actual settler?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that there is a proposition to restore certain lands granted to railroads to the public domain. Is that likely to be done?

Mr. LAFFERTY. I will say in answer to the gentleman's question that there is an immense railroad-land grant of about 2,300,000 acres in Oregon, which Congress required should be sold to settlers, and the railroad company flagrantly violated the terms of the grant. I have a bill pending here that if these lands shall be forfeited that all of them within the exterior boundaries of the forest reserve shall attach to the reserve and not be subject to homestead entry. But only a small portion of the railroad lands are inside the reserves. Most of these lands will go to actual settlers if my bill passes.

Mr. MANN. They are largely timber lands, are they not?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Most of the lands have some timber on them, but they are admirably suited for homes.

It is a foregone conclusion that the pending three-year-homestead bill will pass. That fact is most gratifying to the people of Oregon. We welcome the homesteaders from the East, and we also have many people in our own great city of Portland who will be glad to avail themselves of this opportunity to get a ranch.

The passage of this bill will be the realization of one of my ambitions. That I have worked hard for the measure here the past six weeks many Members can attest. In canvassing my colleagues for the measure I called last Saturday a week ago on no less a personage than the honorable Speaker of this House [Mr. CLARK] and asked him to make a speech in favor of the bill and he did so last Wednesday.

No one who has once enjoyed the balmy Indian summer days of Oregon or inhaled the exhilarating perfume of the firs and pines during the gentle rainfall of winter can ever be satisfied to live anywhere else on the face of the globe. The ideal climate, beautiful scenery, and pure air of that State is one of the greatest assets of this Nation. By this bill we extend a more generous and hearty welcome than ever before to the good people of this country to make homes in Oregon. There is no longer any "new country" to go to. But Oregon will remain young forever. Her snow-capped mountain peaks, her restful green forests, and her rugged coast, with its miles of hard-sand beach, washed by the foaming surf of the Pacific, form a picture that charms and attracts all who see it. In behalf of that State I express the hope that the pending amendment will be rejected and that the bill will be passed. [Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, this committee has had the call on four Calendar Wednesdays. I hope this amendment may be voted upon now and the next section read and the matter disposed of soon.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I call up the amendment that I offered last Wednesday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next section, and then the gentleman's amendment will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That all existing pending entries shall be perfected under and according to the terms of this act, except entries under section 6 of an act passed and approved February 19, 1909, and section 6 of an act passed and approved June 17, 1910, providing for an enlarged homestead, and that as to entries under said sections this act shall not in any wise apply, except that the provision allowing a six months' residence during any calendar year shall apply to all homestead.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

In section 2, line 17, after the word "entries" insert "requiring residence upon the land under the homestead laws."

From the word "act," in line 19, strike out the balance of the section.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment, while it is printed in the bill with the words "shall be" in it, they are in fact not a part of the amendment. It is an erroneous print.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I am of the opinion that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] in the way of a substitute is better than the original section or the section as proposed to be amended.

Mr. MANN. I was going to suggest that we strike section 2 out of the bill entirely. The whole thing will go to conference. I am not prepared to vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, which no one has seen. The committee recommends striking out a part of the section, why not strike out the whole?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I will be pleased to inform the gentleman what the contents of the amendment are in order that he may be advised of it.

Mr. MANN. Before I vote on it I would like to have a chance to read it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois an excellent one. I do not think it makes any difference whether there is any statement in the form of section 2 or not. I do not think it modifies the legislation at all. I think it is entirely superfluous both in the original form and in the form now proposed, and if we are going to adopt any form I think the form suggested by the gentleman from Nebraska is the better. But this is the situation. If this bill becomes a law it will take the place of the present sections of the Revised Statutes amended and will apply to all homesteads just as the present sections apply. Therefore there is no necessity for any direction in the form of legislation that it shall apply to pending entries. It seems to me the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is a very proper one, that the entire section 2 should go out, and if in conference it is deemed advisable and necessary, then some further language could be added.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Oklahoma if the words "shall be" appear in the amendment offered by the committee?

Mr. FERRIS. I have not the amendment before me, and have not examined it. I do not know what the original verbiage of the amendment is.

I do want to say that I hope the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in the last analysis will be adopted, for the reason that this provision having passed the Senate, if it is rejected here, will be dealt with in conference, and then the ideas of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] can be disposed of at a time when we can look into it further.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 19, strike out after the word "act," in line 19, the comma and the word "except" and all of lines 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, and lines 1 and 2 on page 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 2 and substitute the following:
"SEC. 2. That existing pending entries may be perfected either under the provisions of the law as amended by this act, or under the law as it existed previous to the passage of this act, at the option of entrymen."

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I regard this amendment as very important. If the bill be enacted into law as the committee amendment stands, it will leave it in such shape that there will be some doubt about whether or not it would deprive existing entrymen who have already resided on their claims, say, for six years, or any time more than five years, of the right to make their proof. It is stated that this will take effect not only as to future entries, but as to existing entries, without in express language saying so, and that therefore this section 2, as amended by the committee, may be dispensed with. It is said that it is superfluous. If it is to take effect immediately as to existing entries, then those who have lived on their claims more than five years would be cut off, would be debarred of the right to make their proof, to perfect their entries. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, these pioneer homesteaders who have gone there on their claims to live, perhaps all their lives, ought to be encouraged in this. They made their entries with the right to stay seven years before they should make their proofs, and they ought not to be debarred of the right to wait seven years before making proof. If the bill passes without an explicit statement upon this point, great confusion will arise, perhaps consternation, among entrymen. There is no class in the United States who is better posted upon their rights than these homestead entrymen; they diligently read the homestead laws, and those laws ought to be plain not only to the lawyer but to the layman.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. BOWMAN. I would suggest that the gentleman's amendment in its present form, if it prevails, will give the opportunity to file upon land of any class. I suggest that it be modified so that it will apply only to those claims which have been filed prior to this time, and then it will probably accomplish the gentleman's purpose.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. That is just what it does. It restricts to those——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I regard myself as having been unfortunate in being absent last Wednesday, for only about 15 minutes, when the bill was under consideration, when the Speaker of the House took the floor and spoke in behalf of this measure. The Speaker very kindly referred to the Nebraska one-section act, which was passed pursuant to a bill which I myself introduced in the Fifty-eighth Congress. He also alluded to this act in a very friendly way, and I wish to acknowledge my appreciation of the remarks made by him in reference thereto, and also the appreciation of my constituents for his having given his support to the bill in the first instance. I acknowledge also my indebtedness to the then Speaker of the House, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], for allowing the bill to be taken up at the earliest possible time permitted by parliamentary discretion. I desire also to express my own acknowledgment and that of my constituents of our very high appreciation of the service of membership of the Public Lands Committee and of the Fifty-eighth Congress for passing the law which has proven to be so salutary. The wisdom of the act has been vindicated by the increase of population by more than 100,000 in the territory covered by the act as a direct result. All now agree, where many opposed it, even in Nebraska at first, that it was a wise enactment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto close at the expiration of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. MORGAN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am quite in sympathy with the gentleman from Nebraska, and I would suggest to him that if his amendment is voted upon without the committee having full knowledge in regard to it and had chance to inspect it, although we are informed by the gentleman's admirable speech, that it would probably be defeated, and, while the purpose seems to be very fair, that it would probably be taken care of in conference if we strike out the entire section instead of agreeing to his amendment; and I hope the gentleman will see his way clear, after making his statement and calling it to the attention of the House, to withdraw his amendment so that we may, without voting upon it, just strike out the section and throw the whole thing into conference.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion of the minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois, is entirely satisfactory to me. I have confidence that the joint conferees will give due and proper consideration to all these amendments which are now in contemplation, so, with the consent of the committee, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, then, pursuant to the suggestion, I move to strike out section 2 entirely.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I now move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof in one amendment the bill as agreed to in the committee, which the Clerk will report as a substitute for the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 2291 and section 2297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2291. No certificate, however, shall be given or patent issued therefor until the expiration of three years from the date of such entry; and if at the expiration of such time, or at any time within two years thereafter, the person making such entry, or if he be dead his widow, or in case of her death his heirs or devisee, or in case of a widow making such entry her heirs or devisee, in case of her death, proves by himself and by two credible witnesses that he, she, or they have a habitable house upon the land and have actually resided upon and cultivated the same for the term of three years succeeding the time of filing the affidavit, and makes affidavit that no part of such land has been alienated, except as provided in section 2288, and that he, she, or they will bear true allegiance to the Government of the United States, then in such case he, she, or they, if at any time citizens of the United States, shall be entitled to a patent, as in other cases provided by law: Provided, That the entrymen may be absent from the land for not more than five months in each period of one year after establishing residence, but in case of commutation the 14 months' actual residence as now required by law must be shown: Provided, That when the person making entry dies before the offer of final proof those succeeding to the entry must show that the entryman had complied with the law in all respects to the date of his death and that they have since complied with the law in all respects, as would have been required of the entryman had he lived, excepting that they are relieved from any requirement of residence upon the land.

"SEC. 2297. If, at any time after the filing of the affidavit as required in section 2290 and before the expiration of the three years mentioned in section 2291, it is proved after due notice to the settler, to the satisfaction of the register of the land office that the person having filed such affidavit has failed to establish residence within six months after the date of entry, or abandoned the land for more than six months at any time, then and in that event the land so entered shall revert to the Government: Provided, That the three years' period of residence herein fixed shall date from the time of establishing actual permanent residence upon the land: And provided further, That where there may be climatic reasons, sickness, or other unavoidable cause, the Commissioner of the General Land Office may, in his discretion, allow the settler 12 months from the date of filing in which to commence his residence on said land under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill as amended favorably.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 3367) to amend section 2291 and section 2297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to homesteads, and had directed him to report the same to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill with the instructions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit with instructions.

The Clerk read as follows:

I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Public lands, with instructions to said committee to forthwith report the same back to the House amended as follows: Insert after line 2, page 3, the following: "No entry for a homestead or a patent, issued on the same, shall convey any right to salt, potash, coal, petroleum, natural gas, gold, silver, copper, iron, or other mineral within or under the land conveyed by the patent, or any exclusive or other property or interest in, or any exclusive right or privilege with respect to any lake, river, spring, stream, or other body of water within or bordering on or passing through the land covered by the entry."

The question was taken, and the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the amended Senate bill.

The question was taken, and the bill as amended was passed.

On motion of Mr. FERRIS, his motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House ask for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves that the House ask for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. FERRIS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. MONDELL.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. HELGESEN was granted leave of absence for 10 days, on account of sickness.

EXCHANGE OF CERTAIN COAL LANDS, CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW NATIONS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next committee, which is the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas (when the Committee on Indian Affairs was called). Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I desire to call up the bill S. 3686, on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 3686, with the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] in the chair.

The House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 3686, with Mr. RUCKER of Colorado in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 3686) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to permit the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Coal Co. and the Eastern Coal & Mining Co. to exchange certain lands embraced within their existing coal leases in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nation for other lands within said nation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that this is the bill that was objected to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] on last Monday, on the call of the Unanimous Consent Calendar. This bill passed the House and Senate during the last Congress, but was lost because it did not reach the President in time to receive his approval. I have the report here from the department, under date of January 30, 1912, which states that fact, and says:

A bill (H. R. 32531, 61st Cong., 3d sess.) was introduced February 6, 1911, and referred to this department for report. Report was made February 11, 1911, and is set out in House Report No. 2272, Sixty-first Congress, third session. The bill was amended as suggested in the report of the department and was passed by the House March 2, 1911. The discussion in the House of Representatives may be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 2, 1911, pages 4233–4235. It seems that the bill also passed the Senate. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mar. 4, 1911, p. 4400.) It is understood, informally, that the time was too short after its passage in the Senate to permit the bill to be presented to the President for his approval.

I will state that this bill has been carefully prepared by the department, and, as I stated, it has passed both House and Senate and has been favorably and unanimously reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs. It permits a coal company now operating coal mines in the Choctaw Nation to exchange lands not bearing coal for lands having coal underneath them. They have already spent quite a lot of money in prospecting this land, and they have not found coal in paying quantities on the land now leased to them, and they desire to exchange for other coal-bearing lands.

The Indians get a royalty of 8 cents per ton for all the coal mined from the lands now held under lease by this company under the act of 1898, and the lease runs for 30 years and covers 960 acres of land. The company now desires to exchange a portion of that lease—360 acres of it—and to be permitted to take the same amount of lands elsewhere that is ascertained to have coal under them. They have bored many holes through the strata where the coal should be found in the lands they now have, and they find there is no valuable coal in them, and they find that there is good coal on the tract which they want to substitute for their leased lands, and unless this coal company makes this exchange the Indians will get no royalty from the coal land the company desires to acquire by this bill. On that point the department says, in a letter quoted in a report on this bill:

If it be the purpose of Congress to authorize the immediate sale of the coal deposits of the Choctaw and the Chickasaw Nations, the propriety of permitting exchanges of this character might be doubted.

This letter was dated January 30, 1912. Since then we have authorized the segregation of the surface from the coal, and authorized the department to sell the surface of the land, holding the coal for the lease or future disposition by Congress. Therefore the conditions under which the department approves this bill have already arisen, and this bill, as I understand, would have been signed by the President as it passed the House and Senate last Congress.

The department, in its communication of January 30, 1912, makes the following statement:

If, however, the sale of the coal deposits is to be deferred to some future time, it would seem entirely just and equitable to the lessees and profitable to the Indians to permit relinquishment of lands which have been proven not to bear coal and the selection of other segregated coal lands in lieu thereof. The lessees have necessarily expended considerable money in developing the mines, and should be allowed to reap some benefit from this expenditure by mining coal which may be reached from the developments thus made. The Indians would by such an arrangement receive an income from the coal mined.

It is suggested that the word "nation," occurring twice in the title of the bill, be changed to the plural, "nations," in each instance.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] represents that district in Oklahoma, and I will yield the floor to him.

Mr. CARTER. Well, I have no desire to say anything unless some one wants some information about it.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. This is Indian land that is to be leased, is it?

Mr. CARTER. It is.

Mr. FOSTER. And the gentleman's knowledge of the condition of affairs there leads him to believe that all the rights of the Indians are taken care of in this proposition?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, thoroughly.

Mr. FOSTER. And they will get the full value of the coal that underlies that land, and no harm can come in that way?

Mr. CARTER. They get 8 cents a ton royalty, which, on the basis of a 4-foot vein, would give them about $320 per acre.

Mr. FOSTER. This lease is to be made under the laws of Oklahoma?

Mr. CARTER. There is no provision for leasing coal lands in Oklahoma. If there were, there would be no necessity for this bill. But this gives them the coal lands under the same provisions exactly as those under which the original leases were made.

Mr. FOSTER. They made an original lease to these parties, and they found no coal under the land which they had.

Mr. CARTER. That is the situation.

Mr. FOSTER. So they now ask to get other lands in lieu of what they had taken?

Mr. CARTER. That is correct.

Mr. FOSTER. Has this company spent money only for boring to ascertain the location or whereabouts of the coal, or have they sunk a shaft?

Mr. CARTER. This Missouri, Kansas & Texas Coal Co. has done quite extensive mining and probably has taken out one-half or more of the coal in the coal-bearing part of the lands under lease. The part that is proposed to be relinquished here has no coal or very little, anyway. That comes about on account of the lease having been made before the coal crop was defined.

The lease was made, if I remember correctly, about the year 1901, and in 1902 and in 1903 the crop of the coal was definitely defined. When application was made for this lease it was presumed that the crop of the coal ran regularly, and the lease was made upon that basis, but as I now remember, when the property was properly prospected and developed it was discovered that the line of the crop was very uneven and broken, and left within one of these leases about 160 acres and in the other about 320 acres of noncoal-bearing land. Now, it is proposed to drop back and take 120 acres in one tract and 360 acres in another of coal-bearing land in exchange for the land that was leased, which contained no coal.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, I would like to ask another question. Is this coal of more value now in Oklahoma than it was when these parties secured the original lease?

Mr. CARTER. Decidedly not. It is of less value on account of the oil and the gas development that has occurred there since the lease was made.

Mr. FOSTER. And it is the gentleman's opinion that 8 cents a ton royalty, which goes to the Indians, is sufficient pay for that coal at this time?

Mr. CARTER. I think it is, but this bill does not establish an arbitrary rate of royalty.

Mr. FOSTER. But it gives them the same rate now that they originally had?

Mr. CARTER. It gives them the same rate that they have now under the rules and regulations of the department. The rate of royalty is established by the rules and regulations of the Interior Department, and may be raised or lowered as the necessity demands.

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman mean by "necessity demands"? What is the rate under this lease?

Mr. CARTER. I did not catch what the gentleman said.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said that the rate may be lowered or raised as the necessity demands. What does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. CARTER. I mean this: If the operators could not work their mines and pay an 8-cent per ton royalty, the Secretary of the Interior might, in his discretion, decrease the royalty. If it was found that the royalty was too small, the Secretary of the Interior might increase the royalty.

Mr. MANN. What is the rate in the lease?

Mr. CARTER. There is no arbitrary rate in the lease. The rate is left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior; but the established rate, under the present rules and regulations, is 8 cents per ton.

Mr. FOSTER. So that they are paying 8 cents now upon the coal that they are mining?

Mr. CARTER. They are paying 8 cents a ton upon all coal upon a mine-run basis. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], having had some experience with the mining business, knows that that is a fair royalty for this coal.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the quality of that coal?

Mr. CARTER. It is a very fair quality.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it high-grade bituminous coal?

Mr. CARTER. It is high-grade bituminous coal; very good bituminous coal.

Mr. FOSTER. What does that coal sell for in Oklahoma, say, at the mine?

Mr. CARTER. It will bring about $3 a ton, I should say.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not mean at the mine?

Mr. CARTER. I do not mean at the mine. I mean in the mining towns. Just what it sells for at the tipple at the present time I do not know right now. I think it costs something like $1.50 to $1.75 a ton to produce it f. o. b. the cars.

Mr. FOSTER. To produce the coal?

Mr. CARTER. Yes. The pitch is very steep, and it has other disadvantages which cause it to be a very expensive coal to mine. For instance, at many places the vein is very thin, often under 3 feet; in others the top or bottom, or both, are bad; in still other instances the veins are faulty and highly impregnated with gases.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman understands it correctly, that it costs $1.75 a ton to mine that coal, then the gentleman's statement of $3 a ton is not much out of the way.

Mr. CARTER. I probably put that a little high for the mining towns. I think it does sell for about $3 a ton at retail in many of the towns.

Mr. MANN. You can buy all the coal you want at the mine, where it is mined, for $1 to $1.50 a ton.

Mr. MADDEN. The cost of mining is not over 90 cents.

Mr. CARTER. The cost of producing this coal is $1.50 to $1.75, as I remember it.

Mr. FOSTER. Not mine-run coal?

Mr. CARTER. Of course I do not mean to say that the coal digger gets $1.50. I do not remember exactly what the coal digger gets; but when the coal is finally loaded on the cars and all expenses paid, including wages, not only of coal diggers but of daymen, topmen, office force, powder, fuel, repairs, interest on bonds and other investments, officials' salaries, and other overhead charges, you will find that estimate is not exaggerated.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand it, this bill simply gives this company the right to select coal lands to the same number of acres as the land already selected, which has been found to have no coal under it.

Mr. CARTER. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Has it been the custom to do that sort of thing in Oklahoma or is this the first case?

Mr. CARTER. No——

Mr. FOSTER. What do they do in oil, and matters of that kind down there?

Mr. CARTER. Oil is entirely different. This particular tract of land is what is known as the segregated mineral land that was set aside by the Secretary of the Interior under the law of July 1, 1902. The only way by which any mining can be done upon these lands is by a lease approved by the Secretary of the Interior. It is different with the oil leases. The act of July 1, 1902, prevents any further leasing of this coal land at all, and were it not for that act we would not have to pass this law to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. This bill simply gives this company the right to lease this additional coal land?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; that is all.

Mr. FOSTER. How much land have they there in which there is coal, under their original lease?

Mr. CARTER. Six hundred acres.

Mr. FOSTER. That they still have?

Mr. CARTER. Yes. After releasing this 360 acres they will have 600 acres.

Mr. FOSTER. They want to get 300 acres more?

Mr. CARTER. They want to get 360 acres more and to release 360 acres of lands barren of coal.

Mr. FOSTER. And get 360 acres of land that has coal under it?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Is it not a fact that what they propose to re-lease has been worked out and exhausted?

Mr. CARTER. That is not the fact.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I am very well informed that such is the case.

Mr. CARTER. I will state to the gentleman that I do not believe his information is as good as mine, because I was mining trustee and had personal supervision of this property when this lease was made.

Mr. FOSTER. How long has it been in operation?

Mr. CARTER. Since 1902. I was in touch with that mine for three years afterwards, and I remember very distinctly when it was discovered that a part of this lease was noncoal-bearing land.

If my memory serve me correctly, this company made application for this change as soon as the mistake was discovered. I think I made the investigation and reported to the Secretary of the Interior recommending favorable action, but the report probably reached the department too late. But that is immaterial. If the coal has been worked out, it makes no difference as far as the Indian is concerned, unless the gentleman desires to stop the production of coal in Oklahoma. The only method on earth by which the Indian can get any royalty whatever is by some legislation permitting the coal to be leased. The coal operator can not operate, can not take the coal out, even the Indians can not take it out themselves unless we give them permission. The Secretary of the Interior can not give that permission. What will be the result? If we do not pass this legislation these lands are going to be unproductive. If we pass the bill the Indian will get royalty from about 480 acres of coal land, whereas he now gets nothing. Furthermore, I understand that the work of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Co. has proceeded very near the limit of its lease.

Gentlemen familiar with the coal business know that as soon as the company gets the coal out the mine will be abandoned and fill up with water, and the value of the coal on this 480 acres will be destroyed, or greatly damaged and rendered almost impossible to mine.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I will.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Is it not a fact that there are companies willing to go in there and pay a much higher tonnage than these people pay?

Mr. CARTER. I believe that if this leasing system were opened up generally to-day you would get very few bona fide applications for leases of the segregated mineral lands of Oklahoma, even at the present price.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I understand they are paying as high as 15 cents a ton.

Mr. CARTER. Oh, that may be true; if a vein of coal lies flat on the top of the ground and is coal of first-class quality. I can imagine conditions so favorable that an operator might pay 50 cents, but they do not exist in the Choctaw field.

Mr. AKIN of New York. But they are in the way so that others can not get in.

Mr. CARTER. They are not in the way. There are to-day more than 100,000 acres of these coal lands under lease and the mines are running at about one-tenth their capacity. Now, the gentleman seems to have some fear that this bill gives some company some special privilege. I will say that no other company would go in there for this land in its present condition. Gentlemen who know anything about the coal-mining business know that no company would put in expensive machinery for mining deep down in the earth with only 120 acres of coal lands in sight. They could not afford to do it. So if some legislation of this kind is not adopted you are going to destroy the value of this property to the Indians.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BOWMAN. Does the gentleman know of any royalty rate on bituminous coal that amounts to $1, 50 cents, 25 cents, 20 cents, or 15 cents a ton in any part of the United States?

Mr. CARTER. I am frank to confess that my first-hand knowledge about the royalties on coal is very limited—limited, in fact, to this very field. There was a time when there was paid in this field 15 cents per ton on a screen basis.

Mr. BOWMAN. I will say that the usual rate on bituminous coal in any part of the United States does not exceed 8 or 10 cents a ton; on good veins lying level 8 cents per ton is a common rate, and very much is mined at 3 and 4 cents per ton.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. It seems to me that there is only one serious question connected with this legislation, and that is whether or not this coal-mining company is seeking to abandon some bad-working ground and thin veins within the field of its operations. I do not say that it might not be proper to do that if we knew all the facts.

Now, I think I understood the gentleman from Oklahoma to say that the land that these people propose to abandon is land beyond the crop line of the vein, land beyond the point where the vein is of a workable character. If we had a plat of the locality and of the crop line we could judge very much better of the facts regarding the legislation. But in roughly drawing a township plan here I find that some of the land proposed to be abandoned would seem to be—I do not say that it is—some of the land proposed to be abandoned seems to be within the body of the coal area that the company is mining.

Mr. CARTER. I do not catch the exact purport of the gentleman's question.

Mr. MONDELL. I say that some of the land you propose to let them abandon seems to be within the area that the company is mining. In other words, this company may be attempting to relieve itself from mining expensive coal by dropping an area in the midst of its operations and going to other lands where the coal seam is thicker and of a better quality and the roof conditions are better. Manifestly it would not be in the interest of the Indians to allow the company to leave this coal that can be mined or ought to be mined.

I want to know if it is very clear in the mind of the committee—for it is not clear in my mind, with the rought draft that I have made of the land described—that the lands you propose to exclude from the lease are beyond the line of workable coal. It would rather appear that they were in the main body of the coal, and therefore might be lands workable, but probably not advantageously workable.

Mr. CARTER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have to speak in regard to that almost wholly from memory. I have to trust my memory almost two years back, or, at any rate, a year, when the House passed this bill before.

My recollection of the matter is this: That practically all of the coal land that was sought to be released was noncoal bearing. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] will know that this might not be literally true. It may be that some small subdivision, say 10 to 40 acres, contains an acre or two of coal, but, practically speaking, the land sought to be released is barren of coal.

Mr. MONDELL. Why is it necessary to exclude that land from the lease, unless it be that the company wants to be relieved of the obligation to take from that land such coal as the land contains?

Mr. CARTER. The necessity for releasing that particular tract, if that is what the question is directed to, would be that it contains not sufficient coal to be valuable for mineral purposes.

Mr. MONDELL. I can see no objection to including in the lease a 40-acre tract if it contains only 2 acres of coal, because they are not going to mine coal where there is no coal.

Mr. CARTER. That would be true if the lease were not restricted to a certain number of acres, but here you have a restriction, and that restriction I think everybody will agree, makes it about as small as a coal lease of that character of coal should be. Under these limitations a coal operator will naturally be seeking to get every acre of workable coal that he can get, and he will necessarily eliminate every acre of noncoal-bearing land possible, so that if it came to a question of deciding on a 10-acre block, with only 2 or 3 acres of coal in it, I think he would naturally leave out that 10 acres and include another 10 with enough coal to be valuable for mining purposes.

Mr. MONDELL. But if he has a 40-acre block or a 10-acre block, which contains only 2 acres of coal, and it is at the margin of the workable coal area, he ought not to be relieved from the necessity of working it out, because if he is relieved and abandons his entries leading to that coal it can never be thereafter worked.

Mr. CARTER. Again, that might be true if there were no opportunity for that coal to ever be worked, but I am pretty sure that in this case most of the land re-leased lies next to other unleased land, and could be included in other leases.

Mr. MONDELL. But if the gentleman will allow me right there. The gentleman knows how coal veins occur, and he knows if you are following a vein toward the limit of workable area some other operator can not go over on the other side and bore through the ground——

Mr. CARTER. Oh, if the gentleman will stop right there—he completely misunderstands what I said. I did not say that one operator might go on the lease of another and conduct operations. I did not say that you could go on the land adjoining this lease or any other unleased land and mine coal. On the contrary, you can not, under the present law, touch the other unleased land, but I do say that some of this land which is re-leased probably lies next to land which is unleased, and at the proper time, when this unleased land is taken up and worked out, the other can be worked out along with it. As I remember, this 120 acres re-leased by the Eastern Coal Mining Co. is a narrow strip of land lying between two leases and may not be worked in any manner whatever unless it is worked from the openings that are already made through one of these mines on each side of it.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not claim—and there is nothing in the report to enlighten us upon that fact—as to whether or not the lands proposed to be abandoned are beyond the possible limit of profitable mining, or, on the contrary, whether they may not be lands that the company simply desires to be relieved from the necessity of mining because the mining costs too much—and may I make one other observation right there?

Mr. CARTER. I will ask the gentleman to permit me to answer that, and then he can make his observation afterwards. I tried to make myself very plain upon that point. I stated to the gentleman as plainly as I could that there might be some little portion of a re-leased subdivision which contained coal, but there has been no attempt to re-lease any coal-bearing land; and certainly an operator would not let any land he could profitably mine lie idle for two or three years waiting a change in the lease, and that is the time this application has been pending. It seems to me, if that were true, this operator certainly would have mined the coal in these two or three years that he has been waiting to get this change made in this lease.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BOWMAN. Does not your leases provide that your coal shall be mined? Do they not say so many acres of coal shall be minable?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. BOWMAN. Is there any law which will provide for a company mining coal upon which a reasonable profit could not be made? In view of the provisions or rules of the department, if a miner can prove that the claim can not be profitably mined, will not a provision be made reducing the royalty?

Mr. CARTER. I think I stated that very clearly.

Mr. BOWMAN. And is it not also a fact that after a company has built its works and driven its gangways to a given piece of coal it will mine every ton it possibly can even at a loss in order to keep the operation going and get out the first cost?

Mr. CARTER. I think that is perfectly patent to anyone who understands anything about coal mining.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I will be glad to.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. As I understand it, at the time the lease was made the law provided that leases could be made by the nations, said leases to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And the act of July 1, 1902, provided that no further leases should be made. Is that the case?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; that is true.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And, again, in the act of April 26, 1906, it was provided that there should be no further leases.

Mr. CARTER. That is true.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman if it was not the theory at that time that these mineral lands would be disposed of and sold and it was thought best not to make any further leases?

Mr. CARTER. That was the purpose.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. We have recently passed a law providing for the sale of the surface of these lands, or, rather, selling the lands and reserving the minerals. Therefore there can be no longer any objection to leases being made for mining the coal.

Mr. CARTER. I can see none in the world.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then would it not be wise to enact legislation providing for the making of leases so that if anybody desires to lease lands or lease the mineral that they may have the right to do so without coming to Congress with a special bill every time a lease is made?

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman from South Dakota is unquestionably correct. Congress should not be burdened with such ministerial duties as these. I have called the attention of the Indian Office to the matter he discusses. Just this morning I talked to the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and he told me he would confer with the commissioner on a plan looking to the leasing of such lands under similar conditions to the old leases. Especially did he speak of the necessity for safeguarding just such cases as these without compelling them to come to Congress and take up the time of the House and Senate with such matters, which ought to be purely administrative propositions.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Well, the gentleman will probably say that it will be in the interest of the Indians if all the lands could be leased right now under terms under which these lands are proposed to be leased.

Mr. CARTER. I should certainly think that is true, if we were convinced that the coal will be worked.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I understand; that is what I say, if they can be worked. Now, in this particular instance of these two companies, unless we do authorize this change the mine will not be operated, probably, and the Indians will not receive any royalty.

Mr. CARTER. That is true, and furthermore, as I have just stated, this company will abandon its plant as soon as it takes the coal out. It will pull out the pillars and remove all improvements. What will then happen is common knowledge to all coal men. The mine falls in and fills up with water, destroying all opportunity to take this coal out at the old openings, and it is extremely doubtful if anyone will go to the expense of reopening the mine for such a small area of coal.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And this bill does not extend the period of the original lease.

Mr. CARTER. It does not. They will have to get the coal out within the time limit of their original lease.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say these people were waiting upon something of that sort. Why do they want to wait; why not go ahead and mine the coal?

Mr. CARTER. Perhaps I was unfortunate in the word I used. What I meant was they were waiting to have this legislation passed. I did not mean to say that they had stopped the operation of the mine at all. The mine is in full-blast operation and has been every day they could work under the adverse conditions of mining coal in Oklahoma.

Mr. MANN. Have they mined practically all the coal on the land which they now have?

Mr. CARTER. They have not.

Mr. MANN. Then why are they so anxious to get additional land now, on the ground that the plant will stop?

Mr. CARTER. They are anxious to get it for two reasons. First, because it is important to know just what direction and character the openings must take; secondly, because every man wants all the area of coal he can work from one opening or set of openings. And there is some justice on their side when you consider they were given 960 acres which they themselves thought and which the Interior Department thought contained coal. All they ask is that they have the same area of coal-bearing land they thought they were getting under their lease and which the department thought it was giving to them.

Mr. MANN. They first got 960 acres, under a 30-year lease, 10 or 11 years ago—in 1901.

Mr. CARTER. I think so.

Mr. MANN. Now, how much coal is there left on the land embraced in the 960 acres and not embraced in this bill?

Mr. CARTER. Of course, I could not tell that accurately, but by the way the other mines work and by the way this particular company works——

Mr. MANN. I do not want to judge of how some other mine works but specifically how this mine works.

Mr. CARTER. I should not think there is a man in the State of Oklahoma who could tell offhand just how much coal he has mined nor what acreage has been taken out of a certain one of his mines.

Mr. MANN. I do not suppose there is a man on earth who can not tell approximately the acreage mined.

Mr. CARTER. But the gentleman wanted the specific fact.

Mr. MANN. In this case—not compared with some other mine. I want to know in relation to this mine how much of this particular land remains unmined.

Mr. CARTER. Well, I have not been in the mine for three or four years.

Mr. MANN. I supposed the gentleman was furnished with the information.

Mr. CARTER. Unfortunately, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, I have not that exact information, but I should say that not less than 50 per cent of this coal has been mined, and probably 60 per cent or 70 per cent.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Bearing on the question asked by the gentleman from Illinois, my recollection is that I reported this bill a year ago. I talked with the superintendent of the mine at that time and my memory is that he told me that they had still enough coal to keep the mine in operation a year and a half or two years, and at the end of that time there would be taken out practically all the coal covered by their lease or the coal adjacent to the land proposed to be leased, and that it was desirable to continue the work of mining in that direction.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, a number of leases were made on these Indian coal lands in 1901, 30-year leases. Of course, they might mine all inside of 30 years; but for those leased under these leases, if the coal is taken out of the ground so there is very little of it left there, then it becomes a very valuable lease.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But in this case here is a portion of the ground that has coal that is adjacent to this shaft that would not be taken out through a separate shaft. It could only be operated through a shaft that has already been sunk and is in operation.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman quite confident this could not be taken out by a separate shaft?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, it could be, but it would necessitate the extension of railroad switches and sinking an additional shaft.

Mr. MANN. Then it is certainly a very great blunder on the part of the department or cute on the part of the lessee if they left out a piece of coal land which subsequently would have to be mined through the same opening. It is a very great blunder one way or the other.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois they could do that under this lease—that is, they had the maximum of acreage under their first lease—but they discovered that some 300 acres were not coal bearing and they want to substitute coal-bearing lands for them.

Mr. MANN. I do not remember that there was any maximum provision of 960 acres in any law that we passed.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is the maximum.

Mr. CARTER. That is in the law of June 28, 1898.

Mr. MANN. Certainly, when the department was leasing 960 acres, it did not lease it in such a way that no one could mine it except through the opening this lessee made. I think the gentleman is mistaken about it being necessary to mine this land through this opening.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] were familiar with the topography of that country, he would see that it does have some practical application. It does have in this case. It would be very difficult to reach some of these coal-bearing lands.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think, then, if these people have constructed their plants for the purpose of mining 960 acres of land, and that that is practically exhausted and their plants constructed, that they can afford to pay a little more royalty for a piece exactly adjacent that has to be mined through the same opening?

Mr. CARTER. Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that the amount of royalty is left entirely with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I heard the gentleman say that a moment ago, and he may be correct.

Mr. CARTER. That statement is correct.

Mr. MANN. But if the gentleman was no more correct about that than he is about the cost of mining coal and about the price of coal, we would be badly off.

Mr. CARTER. I stand by the statement that coal sells for $3 per ton in the towns of Oklahoma.

Mr. MANN. If the coal is sold at $3 a ton, then they ought to pay a royalty much higher than 8 cents a ton. They pay that in my own State, where the coal sells for $1 a ton at the mines, and sometimes for less.

Mr. CARTER. Then the coal in his locality must be mined under much more favorable conditions. Ours is considered to be the most difficult coal to mine anywhere in the western part of the country.

Mr. MANN. I doubt that.

Mr. CARTER. It is. Because it is a very steep-pitch coal. Some of the coal there pitches more than 50°—almost straight down. It is highly impregnated with gas; it almost invariably has a bad top and a bad bottom, and many of the veins are less than 3 feet thick.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the thickness of the veins?

Mr. CARTER. The thickness of the veins runs from about 2 feet to 4½ feet.

Mr. MANN. My distinguished friend from Oklahoma has been in the House for quite a while, and he must remember that we have had a good many controversies in the House concerning the royalty that should be paid for coal. My recollection is that the gentleman from Oklahoma was one of those who voted practically in favor of a royalty of 50 cents per ton upon coal up by the North Pole. But the gentleman thinks that 8 cents a ton royalty now is enough for coal in a civilized community.

Mr. CARTER. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that, unless my memory is at fault. I think I voted for an amendment fixing the royalty in Alaska at 25 cents a ton. I think I followed the lead of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois on that score. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken for once. He did not follow me, and I think I was wrong. I voted on the motion to suspend the rules, which required a two-thirds vote to pass, and I do not think it received 25 per cent of the vote of the House, because the royalty was not supposed to be high enough. A royalty up at the North Pole, where they may need fire, but where they have not much occasion for it, was from 3 to 7 cents a ton, if I remember aright.

Mr. CARTER. Was there not an amendment offered to that fixing the rate at 25 cents a ton?

Mr. MANN. There may have been amendments that were attempted to be made. The motion was to suspend the rules, and there could be no amendments proposed. Various amendments were argued in favor of 50 cents a ton, and it was declared that the testimony in the Ballinger-Pinchot investigation showed that the coal was worth that. I think the gentleman had better look up his record. I think the gentleman voted against the bill.

Mr. CARTER. Grant that I did, I understand the veins of coal in Alaska are from 6 to 10 feet thick. There are no such veins as that in Oklahoma.

Mr. BOWMAN. They are very hard to find. The gentleman will find that out.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. CARTER. I will yield now to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER. I want to say that there were some statements made by officials of the Interior Department at that time in reference to the great value of the Alaska coal, statements which have since been denied; and it is claimed that a great deal of the coal in Alaska is in ledges, and for that reason it is hard to mine and is not of the value it was thought to possess at the time. But I would like to know if that is true or not. Which of the statements are we to believe as to the value of the coal in Alaska?

Mr. CARTER. I understand——

Mr. MADDEN. They quarry the coal in Alaska. It is all on the surface. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. There will probably be more conflicting statements, I will say to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], when they get additional information on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. Officials of the department came back from a trip up there and made these statements, differing from those which had been made by the officials of the Geological Survey. Does not the gentleman remember that?

Mr. MANN. I remember that, but those statements may be subject to correction, just as is the gentleman's statement that it costs $1.50 to the miner to mine a ton of coal. Such coal could not be mined anywhere in the world.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be true.

Mr. MANN. It may be that the Secretary of the Interior is one who can pass upon it. The gentleman is not a miner.

Mr. FOSTER. Here is a gentleman from the State of Washington [Mr. WARBURTON] who says it costs that much to mine coal in his State.

Mr. CARTER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to make a statement in my own time, if I may be permitted to use it. These minerals are the property of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes.

Before this leasing system began this coal was worked under tribal contracts. The act of June 28, 1898, made provision for the leasing of coal and asphalt in this field. This act recognized all tribal contracts under which bona fide operations had been previously conducted and left the fixing of the royalty to the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary fixed the royalty first at 15 cents per ton, screen basis, then changed it to 8 cents, mine run, and that rate has remained in force for 12 years with no protests by either department, Indian, or operator; in fact, no kicks any place except on the floor of this House.

The act of July 1, 1902, came along and prevented any further leasing of these lands. It stopped the leasing completely. In the meantime, about 100,000 acres, as I remember, had been leased by operators, and was being operated. The act of July 1, 1902, also provided for the segregation of these lands and the taking of a survey of them. When this survey was made it was found in a great many instances that the companies had leased lands which did not contain coal.

This is a simple proposition of this fatal mistake with two companies, one with about one-third of the leased land barren of coal and the other with one-eighth barren. We do not seek to change conditions in the slightest. This bill simply provides that this barren land in these two leases be relinquished, and an equal amount of coal-bearing lands taken in lieu thereof under the same conditions as the original lease. What I have to say in reply to the criticism which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes about the original conditions of those leases is that the gentleman from Illinois was himself a Member of the House at the time that law was passed, and I was not; and if the law did not suit him, it seems to me that was the time for him to make his complaint. If it does not suit him to-day, and he will bring in an amendment to it, I shall be very glad to consider it with a view to giving it my support, because I have the very greatest confidence in the judgment of the gentleman from Illinois and in his ability to create good and successful legislation. [Applause.]

But there was one other proposition which the gentleman from Illinois spoke about, and that was this: He indirectly criticized somebody for the manner in which these leases were made. Whether his criticism is correct or not I will not assume to say, but I will say that he did correctly describe the conditions that exist in a great many instances. For instance, two leases have been made of lands within a quarter of a mile of each other, leaving from 40 acres to 100 acres between, which probably never will be worked except by the companies that have the leases on one side or the other. That is an unfortunate condition, but it exists, and, in justice to the Indians, we ought to provide some way by which this coal can be taken out.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman imagine that the companies will be back here, wanting an act of Congress to permit them to lease this extra land on the ground that they are the only people who can work it?

Mr. CARTER. Undoubtedly they are the ones who can work it most successfully.

Mr. BOWMAN. After a mine is once worked out and filled up with water, do gentlemen appreciate the expense and almost the impossibility of opening it up?

Mr. CARTER. Indeed I appreciate that and have spoken to that point. The gentleman from Illinois asked why it was that these gentlemen are so persistent now, with only half of their coal mined, in their efforts to get this new land added to their lease. It is because it is necessary, almost from the time the shaft is sunk, for the company to have some knowledge of the direction and scope its openings will take. For instance, if it is found necessary by reason of the topography of the surface to sink the slope near the limit of the property, they might not run a cross entry both ways, but could open their rooms from the main entry, but cross entries would be run both ways if the area of coal justified.

Now, this company wants to know what it is going to do and which way it shall run its entries. It probably will run an entry out through the balance of its property in the direction of this land which it desires to lease, but will not run that entry unless this land is leased.

I want to say further that there is no provision to make the company take the coal out of the mine at a loss, if it wants to leave it there. In that case the Indians might not only lose the royalties on this 480 acres, but might also lose the royalties on a part of the coal in the existing lease, which the operator might be able to prove he could not operate at a profit.

I think that is all I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, if no one desires to ask any further questions.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have not been conspicuous on the floor of the House as an advocate of what some gentlemen call conservation. I believe I have always been in favor of a true and proper conservation of the Nation's resources, but I have never made a fetish of that sort of thing. I have noticed, however, that when a measure comes up on the floor of the House that involves what gentlemen are pleased to term conservation there are certain gentlemen who always become much interested.

Now, I want to call to the attention of the extreme advocates of conservation the very great danger that lurks in this legislation from their standpoint. We all know that coal at the pit mouth in the United States is about the cheapest article produced, taking into consideration the investment in the mines and the labor involved. I have in my hand a document, the Mineral Resources of the United States, for 1910, and I find that the average price of bituminous coal at the pit mouth in the United States was $1.12 a ton—a marvelously cheap product. The gentlemen of the Mining Bureau and the Geological Survey tell us that so intense is the competition in the mining of coal that operators find it very difficult to extract from the mines all of the coal that they contain. They find it very difficult to maintain those conditions of safety which ought to be maintained, because of the intense competition. We have heard a great deal about the loss of coal in mining.

It has been placed as high as 50 per cent, and I do not know as that is too high. There are mines where the recovery is as high as 90 per cent. Some mines where the recovery is as low as 30 per cent, but as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOWMAN] stated a moment ago, the recovery will be the last possible ton that can be taken from the mine and sold at a profit; the last possible ton that can be sold even at the cost of mining, because when the coal operator has built his works, has made the large investment necessary in the way of shafts or tunnels and entries, has put up his machinery for screening and loading the coal, he has so large an investment that it becomes absolutely essential that he should have as large a tonnage as possible over which to distribute that overhead cost. Therefore the limit of recovery is fixed by market conditions. Not a ton will ever remain in a mine which can be taken out and sold at any sort of a profit, and in conducting an ordinary operation some coal will be taken out that cost more than the average price received at the pit mouth.

Mr. CARTER. That is always true of slack.

Mr. MONDELL. It is true also of coal encountered in the lines of entries where the coal is taken out, or should be taken out, to secure as large a recovery as possible.

Now, there are peculiar conditions in Oklahoma. The gentleman from Illinois was surprised, and so was I, at the very high figure stated by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] as the cost of mining coal in Oklahoma. I do not feel so bad about it as I might, because if I am mistaken with the gentleman from Illinois I am mistaken in very good company in any event. I find that while the average price of bituminous coal in 1910 at the pit mouth in the entire United States was $1.12, the average price in Oklahoma was $2.22.

Now, it follows that either it costs more to mine coal in Oklahoma than it does elsewhere, or else the coal operators in Oklahoma are obtaining a very much larger profit than elsewhere. The latter fact may be true, but the probability is that the truth is somewhere between the two statements. While the Oklahoma operators may be obtaining a larger profit than the average coal operator in the United States, the probability is that the cost of mining the coal there is considerably higher than it is generally in the United States.

But I want to make this suggestion, that it is rather unfortunate in these days when there is considerable demand in certain quarters that, so far as the remaining public coal lands are concerned, the Government shall go into the leasing business, that the only place in the United States where coal lands are now leased by the Government is in the region where the operator receives the highest price. In other words, where the Government leases coal lands in Oklahoma the operator receives more than twice the price which the average operator receives throughout the country.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. BOWMAN. On the question of the cost of mining in Oklahoma, from the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], the cost will doubtless exceed $1.75 and probably $2. On veins pitched as he describes there will be a large amount of slack; and my opinion is that it would exceed 50 per cent. He says 60 per cent; and the price would be very low for that class of coal. You will find that coal will cost $2 a ton or upward.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. It is also true that some of these veins worked in Oklahoma are less than 3 feet thick, even less than 2 feet, and everyone familiar with coal mining knows that when you work a thin vein of coal you have to pay an extra price to the miner for taking out the coal.

Mr. MONDELL. We all understand that. There is no place in the United States where bituminous coal sells for so high a price as in Oklahoma, except in the State of Washington. The average selling price in Washington for 1910 was $2.50, while in Oklahoma it was $2.32.

Mr. CARTER. What year was that?

Mr. MONDELL. That was in 1910. That is compared with an average price in the United States of $1.12. The mining of coal in Washington is an expensive operation, owing to the dip of the veins and the presence in the veins of a great deal of waste material that must be picked out, most of it, by hand.

Mr. CARTER. Is that the price to the consumer or the price which the coal operator receives?

Mr. MONDELL. That is supposed to be the price for it at the mine, the coal as sold at the pit mouth by the operator; that is, the price he receives. In this price is included all the cost of operation and all of his profit, if any. Now, to come to this question of real conservation, there is one matter in connection with this legislation on which we should have complete information and on which we have no information at all.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Where is this lease? Is there a copy of it?

Mr. MONDELL. I suppose there is a copy of its somewhere.

Mr. BUTLER. Has the gentleman ever read it?

Mr. MONDELL. I never have and do not care to read it, because I would not have any more information in regard to the matter in issue than I have now if I should read it. If the gentleman will allow me, I will explain why the lease would not cast any light on the one important matter.

Mr. BUTLER. If there is a minimum tonnage described in the lease, I think it would give us a good deal of information.

Mr. MONDELL. The Government is leasing coal in Oklahoma. I suppose owing to the conditions there existing it is necessary for the Government to lease the coal. The Government leases it on behalf of the Indians. Now, what light does this leasing operation throw on the general proposition, now more or less discussed, of the general leasing of the public coal lands?

The argument is made that we ought to lease the remaining public coal lands, in order that the people may get coal cheaply. As I said a moment ago, about the cheapest product in the world to-day is coal at the pit mouth. If there is anyone anywhere who has any legitimate complaint of the price of coal, that complaint is entirely due to an increase in the price of coal after it leaves the pit mouth. Men who know the most about mining coal regret that it is necessary, by reason of intense competition, to sell coal as cheaply as it is now sold generally at the pit mouth. The low prices tend to tempt operators to forego the necessary precautions for the safety of the miners. Coal is always too low if the low price is at the cost of human life and limb.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask if it is not a fact that an immense amount of oil and gas has been discovered in that country, and that that has reduced the price of coal very greatly; and, on the other hand, they have to pay a very high price for mining the coal and placing it on the market; and, therefore, these people can make very little on the royalty.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I will come to the royalty in a moment. The gentleman is getting me away from my line of thought, and if he will kindly allow me to pursue this line of thought a moment, I will come later to the question of royalty. I am not complaining about this royalty. I do not know but what the royalty is too high, and I am inclined to think it is. It is too high if it is above a fair return to the owners of the land and increases the price to the consumer.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. JACKSON. I understand it is true that the State of Oklahoma practically controls and fixes the price of this product at the pit mouth under her local laws.

Mr. MONDELL. If she does, she makes the same kind of a job of it that any administrative bureau will make in attempting to fix the price of commodities. If Oklahoma has fixed the price, she has fixed the price higher than that anywhere else in the United States. In other words, if Oklahoma has advanced to the point where she is fixing the price of commodities, then she has fixed the price of this commodity at just about twice what it is where the ordinary laws of supply and demand under competition are left to operate.

One demand for the leasing of public coal lands is based upon the theory that we must reduce the amount of waste, that we must increase the amount of recovery. They say it is wasteful to allow private individuals and corporations to mine the coal, because they will only take from the mines the coal they can remove at a profit. That is true. That is, they will not remove enough coal above the average cost but what they will have a profit in the aggregate at the end of the season, and the only way you can cure that is by some process to compel the consumer of coal to pay a higher price in order that coal which can not be profitably mined under competitive conditions may be mined.

If we are following that line of conservation in Oklahoma, I think we should compel our lessees in Oklahoma to mine all of the coal within the boundaries of their leases. If we allow them to mine only such coal as they see fit to mine, they will not recover as large a proportion of the coal as they would if they owned the land, because in that case they would take the last ton out that was possible to recover. Being lessees, they are interested only to the extent of getting such coal as they can make a profit on.

The Interior Department has charge of these leases. The Interior Department wants to have charge of leasing the public coal lands in the Western States, and whether or not they should have that added burden placed upon them is, perhaps, more or less illuminated by what they have done in regard to the leases of which they have heretofore had charge. Of course, everybody knows that every coal-mining operation keeps a map of its operation, and any coal-mining operation worthy of the name can show you any day exactly the amount of their territory worked out or partially worked out by their map. I suppose that if the Interior Department is going into the business of superintending the leasing of coal lands, it would be necessary for them to keep duplicates of the maps or operations of the lessees. They certainly ought to do that in these cases where the Government acts as the guardian of the Indians, and therefore the Interior Department ought to have been able to supply us with the information that we ought to have on a bill of this kind. But what are the facts? We have no facts.

Personally, I am willing to take the word of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] in regard to it. I have very great confidence in him, and I have very great confidence in the committee, but nevertheless the House is entitled, if we are going into this sort of thing, to know what the situation is. That is one thing that we, as true conservationists, should insist upon. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman is on the right side at last.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I like to get on the right side occasionally. I notice that my genial friend from Illinois came over on the Lord's side this morning for five minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. And I notice the gentleman from Wyoming is trying to get into the fold for five minutes also, and I am glad to see that he is, because he is generally upon the wrong side.

Mr. MONDELL. That depends altogether on the angle from which you view the matter. I am viewing this from the angle of the true conservationists, and I insist that the Government as the ward of the Indians shall not allow them to be despoiled, and I further insist that the Interior Department, advocating, as it is, the general leasing of coal lands, shall show to us that they are competent to handle that sort of thing, at least in the limited way in which they are endeavoring to handle it in Oklahoma.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield now.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has referred to the Government as the ward of the Indians.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I mean that the Indian is the ward of the Government. I thank the gentleman for correcting me. When I get to talking true conservation I am liable to get things turned around.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And now that the gentleman has come to be a conservationist, I would like to know whether that accounts for his being on the Democratic side of the aisle?

Mr. MONDELL. It is altogether possible that is true. I had not noticed that I am at present speaking from the Democratic side of the center aisle.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman seems to be very good natured just at present, and I would like to ask him some questions.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me just a moment, I will be glad to yield.

Mr. BUTLER. The time belongs to the gentleman, and I shall wait until it suits his pleasure. I want to ask him a question.

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield now.

Mr. BUTLER. This is a hard bargain for the railroad company, is it not?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know.

Mr. BUTLER. If the railroad company asks to have one piece of land substituted for another piece of land that has not paid, it is a hard bargain for the railroad company.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman waits until I get through he may discover that I am not objecting to this legislation generally. [Laughter.] I am pointing out the fact that I am proposing to accept the legislation upon the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] and owing to my confidence in the Indian Committee, and not because they have given me any information in regard to the matter.

I do not think the gentleman should require us to always legislate in that way. I think that when the matter before the House is one on which there should be thorough information, it is the duty of the department in charge of the matter to furnish it to the committee and the committee to secure it. Of course, the Indian Committee could not secure information which the department does not possess.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does the gentleman think the Committee on Indian Affairs could give the gentleman information?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, on many questions, but evidently not on this particular matter. Now, if we are to be true conservationists, in the interest of conservation both from the national standpoint and from the individual standpoint there should be complete recovery of the coal in this mine. We should not allow these people who are mining this coal to pass by and pass over any coal at all. They should be compelled to take it all out in the interest of conservation, else why all this hullabaloo for the last 10 years in favor of a more complete recovery of coal? Here is a chance; the Government has absolute control of this situation and they can compel these people to take that coal out whether it pays to take it out or not; and in the interest of future generations no ton of coal ought to be allowed to remain in that mine after the mine had been abandoned that could have been recovered, and yet—probably this is not true and yet I do not know but what it is true—this company, having encountered some lands in the extension of its entries where the vein is thin or in which the pitch is more than common or other conditions exist which makes mining very expensive, it desires to pass by these areas and take other areas, where the vein is thicker or the angle of inclination is more favorable to mining or the character of the coal is a little better. Now, the Interior Department ought to know all about that. We ought to have a map of this mine; we ought to know whether these areas which we propose to abandon are beyond the limit of the vein.

Mr. CARTER. That is stated in the report.

Mr. MONDELL. No; on the contrary, and I will read it in a minute—whether they are beyond the limit of the coal-bearing area where it is utterly impossible to recover coal. Probably there is some coal in this land. Nobody claims there is none at all, I think.

Mr. CARTER. The Secretary says the land is noncoal bearing. in his report.

Mr. MONDELL. He says it is shown, but he does not say how it is shown or where it is shown or the manner of the showing, except the showing made by the committee itself in the form of a statement that the lands are not satisfactory coal lands.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will allow me, this has all been investigated. We appropriated $50,000. They went out and drilled and sunk shafts and they determined definitely that there was no coal, and when the company found there was not any coal on these lands the Interior Department finds that there was no coal on these lands. Everything that could be done—all the investigations have been made that can be made, and it seems to me that ought to be satisfactory to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, I will say to the gentleman if this is true, then somebody somewhere ought to have put it into a report and stated it officially.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I have just reported it to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Somebody somewhere ought to have given that information so we could understand it. I am willing to take the word of the gentleman——

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I have got it here and I have given the statement to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. But I am still very doubtful with regard to this proposition, whether these lands lay wholly without the coal-bearing area or are they coal-bearing lands where the seam is thin and recovery is expensive, and, if they are, what becomes of our theory of conservation and absolute and complete recovery?

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield at this moment——

Mr. CARTER. I just want to correct the statement the gentleman made.

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment, if my statement needs correction. There is not any reason on earth why these lands should be excluded from their lease unless they want to be relieved from the necessity of mining such coal as is in the land. If there was no coal in this land they would not be compelled to mine coal that was not there, but having had the lands excluded from the lease they are absolved from the requirement of taking from the land such coal as the land may contain. If it be true that these lands are in the lines of their entries and in the midst of their field or on the edge of the field so that it can not be reached from any other point, then whatever coal remains in the lands excluded from this lease never will be recovered and will be lost for all time to come. I now yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER. I just want to state this: The gentleman made a statement, if I understood him correctly, that the Secretary made his report without any information. Let me state that this matter was submitted to the mining trustees—two Indians, one a Choctaw and the other a Chickasaw—whose sole duty it is to represent these two tribes—the Choctaws and Chickasaws. These two trustees went upon the ground and made an official examination of all the conditions. After this careful investigation these two officials—both Indians themselves, mind you, and having no duty to perform except on behalf of the Indians—reported this land sought to be released as noncoal bearing and recommended this legislation. So, Mr. Chairman, it does not seem that the assertion of the Secretary of the Interior being uninformed has very much foundation.

Mr. MONDELL. It is very curious, because from the hurried plat I have made of the land, necessarily somewhat incorrect, it seems some of the lands proposed to be abandoned lie in the body of the lease, and therefore, instead of being absolutely noncoal bearing by reason of being beyond the coal-bearing area, there are possibly some of the lands which contain coal which can not be worked, owing to the price for which coal is sold in Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman ought to know that it is perfectly possible for the very center, I should say, of a coal area to have noncoal-bearing strata. If that were not true coal mining would be impossible, for there would be no crop. The coal can not crop unless there is an anticline or some sort of break through the solid layer of coal. So far as I know there is no law of nature that regulates the extent of this break, and it is just as likely to be small as large; therefore it is not only possible, but certain that noncoal-bearing land of even small dimensions may exist right in the middle of a large coal-bearing area.

Mr. MONDELL. Part of the gentleman's statement is true and part of it is not entirely accurate. There are regions within most coal areas where there is no coal at all. Those little patches here and there to which the gentleman refers are generally places where the vein is thinned or broken or displaced.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman is entirely mistaken about that. He will find a great many places right in the midst of these coal lands that are completely devoid of coal for an area of from forty to several hundred acres.

Mr. MONDELL. However that may be, I want to say in regard to the other statement of the gentleman that of course a coal area does not have to be broken in order to be exposed. Wherever there has been a disturbance of the surface sufficiently deep to bring the coal strata to the surface there is an outcropping, and the vein may extend miles unbroken from the cropping, as it sometimes does, or it may outcrop again a mile away or extend only a short distance from the cropping.

But, Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman says emphasizes this fact, that the Interior Department does not seem to have information in regard to these leases which are placed under its supervision. It does not seem to be able to give us full information in regard to these lands, and we have to take the word of the gentleman from Oklahoma, which I am perfectly willing to take, so far as I am concerned, as to the facts in the case.

Now, there is one other matter connected with this legislation——

Mr. OLMSTED. Before the gentleman passes to that, will he yield to me for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Gladly.

Mr. OLMSTED. The bill itself speaks of these lands as not being valuable for coal. The gentleman concedes that there may be some coal there, but it can not be profitably worked at the present time, and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] says there is no coal there at all, according to his information. Now, if the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has stated the case correctly, if you mine all the coal there is within the limits of a mine, although it may be full of slate, and so forth, you will find that the mining of inferior veins and thinner coal is more expensive and increases the cost of mining. Now, the gentleman says there are 480 acres where there is coal, but that it can not be profitably worked. Would it not be better to allow these lessees to transfer their operations to mines that can be profitably worked for the time being? In the meantime the other coal lands will not be wasted. Later on they can mine the other coal when it can be profitably worked.

Mr. MONDELL. As I am speaking now as a true conservationist, I am not in favor of surrendering the entire platform of conservation, although the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be.

Mr. BUTLER. It is not a question of conservation, but a question of bargain keeping.

Mr. OLMSTED. This bill does not seem to cover the entire platform of conservation. What I am treating of is this 480-acre tract. It seems it would be better to conserve this land entirely until such time as it can be profitably mined. It would conserve this coal in the ground.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] has stated that this is a question of bargain keeping. The gentleman, if he understood the situation, would see that such is not the case at all. The representatives of the Indians favor this legislation and have so reported. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is under the delusion that there is an invisible power somewhere to compel these companies to work this coal against their will. They can not be compelled to work it at a loss.

Mr. MONDELL. Then what is to become of the theory of conservation? [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. I do not want to discuss the theory of conservation with such a thoroughbred conservationist as the gentleman from Wyoming. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. Has the gentleman from Oklahoma read the lease?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; I have read it. I helped to make it as a representative of the Indians.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the gentleman ought to know what is in it. Did you not require this company to take out so much coal in the first year?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; so much coal in the first year, so much in the second year, so much the third year, so much the fourth year, and so much the fifth year, and after that there is no further restriction, as I remember. It is presumed, of course, that no such stipulation would be necessary after the work progressed to the point where the coal could be mined profitably.

Mr. BUTLER. And therefore the provision for the minimum tonnage ran for five years only?

Mr. CARTER. That is according to the regulations.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think that is fair to the Indian—to limit it to five years.

Mr. MONDELL. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania would surrender the entire platform of conservation——

Mr. OLMSTED. No; I want to conserve these 480 acres until the people out there need it.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, but the gentleman should know that once a shaft is sunk and the entries are driven and the coal is mined, whatever may be mined, and then the machinery pulled out and the mine allowed to flood, under ordinary circumstances there can never be any further recovery of coal within those areas. There may be conditions under which a mine could be pumped out and opened up again, and the gas driven out, and the entries retimbered, but they are rare, and it would only occur when the coal is very valuable. A mine once abandoned is practically abandoned forever, except under extraordinary conditions and circumstances. Therefore you are not following a proper rule of conservation if you allow these people to abandon the areas which they are working if they still contain some coal. If that is not what they want to do, I do not see any reason why they should be relieved. If they need more land, give them more. So far as I am concerned, I would be very willing to give them a thousand acres more if they need it.

Mr. CARTER. Right there, Mr. Chairman, let me assure my friend of my willingness to accept an amendment of that kind if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] will.

Mr. MONDELL. To abandon land that may contain some coal is to abandon the entire principle of conservation and go back to the system, which has been so vociferously condemned, of leaving in a mine coal that you can not take out at a price that people will pay for it.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the gentleman be willing to say that these men ought to be compelled to mine the coal if the vein is not big enough to warrant the mining of it?

Mr. MONDELL. Ordinarily I would not insist that they should take out coal which costs more than they can get for it, but in the moments like the present, in which I am a pure conservationist, I shall not surrender the platform of the cult, not for a moment. If you are not going to compel a man to take the coal out, whether it pays him to take it out or not, what becomes of those holy principles for which we have so long fought, and bled, and all but died? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Very briefly, because my time is limited, and I have a number of matters I want to discuss.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware that the recent act of Congress, passed in February, of this year, segregates that land, and that we have agreed to sell the surface, and the coal is reserved for leasing?

Mr. MONDELL. I am not objecting to that. You will not find me objecting to that, even in the moments when I am a true conservationist.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I understood the gentleman to suggest, in the interest of conservation, that where they could not mine the coal profitably at the present time at the prices paid to miners it might be left discretionary to abandon it.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman had listened to what I said, he would know that I have stated that an adherence to the principles of conservation compel us to insist that the coal must be mined, whether it pays or not.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I have listened, and I am coming to that now. I understood the gentleman from Wyoming to object to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED]. Now, I want to know of the gentleman from Wyoming whether he is such an intense conservationist that he would require the miners and lessees of those mines to mine the coal at a loss, where it does not pay.

Mr. MONDELL. In the moments when I am an intense conservationist, I say yes; else I would surrender the platform on which we true conservationists all stand. Why should the Federal Government go into a business the product of which is now the cheapest on earth compared with its real value, unless it be for the purpose of compelling a larger recovery? Preventing waste in the interest of generations unborn is what we true conservationists call it. Of course we all know that larger recovery means that the present generation shall pay more for it; but why be alarmed, or why trouble ourselves about the present generation, when we are looking forward to the interests of a dim and distant posterity?

Mr. CARTER. A dim posterity? The gentleman speaks for himself alone on that point. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I intended to say a posterity in the dim and distant future.

Mr. FERRIS. There is no conservation about that.

Mr. MONDELL. Having started on this proposition of true conservation, we must stick to our guns. We must stand by the principles of conservation, else we will not be justified at all in any of those things that we are doing.

Now, another thing, and in this I am serious. This coal company has a name very similar to the name of a railroad company out there——

Mr. DAVENPORT. It has different stockholders entirely.

Mr. CARTER. They have never had any connection.

Mr. MONDELL. I supposed it was a company connected with the railroad company.

Mr. CARTER. It is not a company connected with the railroad company. The incorporators are James McConnell and the estate of James Degnan and some minor stockholders. I am sure the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. has no stock in the mine.

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad to know that, because if there is any one thing we should not do, whether conservationists or not, it is to allow a common carrier to be interested in the mining of coal. Whatever evils there are in connection with the coal business of this country are largely due to the fact that the mine owners are in many instances the operators of railways.

Mr. BUTLER. Since hearing my friend to-day I am almost persuaded that at times we have done him an injustice. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. The trouble we have had in the matter of coal prices has been largely due to the influence of coal companies closely connected with transportation companies. Such influence has been harmful, and so far as the future is concerned I think we are reasonably safe from further extensions of such connections. I wish it were possible and I hope it will be possible entirely to divorce these two lines of industry, so that the coal operator and the company that carries his product shall be entirely dissociated and have no direct interest one with the other. When that day comes, in my opinion, most of the complaints that we have with regard to the price of coal, except such as arise from the fact that the distributor sometimes gets a very considerable margin, will be done away with, and the present extremely low price of coal at the pit mouth will be reflected, as it ought to be, in the price paid by the ultimate consumer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the very brief period of time that I have remaining I want to say that I have no objection to this bill, after having heard the explanations of the gentlemen from Oklahoma; but I think it is very unfortunate, indeed, that the department does not seem to be better informed with regard to these operations under its jurisdiction and of which it has charge. The department ought to have been able to inform the committee fully as to the character and condition of the lands proposed to be abandoned, and I for one would be perfectly willing, if there were lands where the vein was too thin, speaking now not as a conservationist, but as an ordinary citizen, that the department, if it felt it was proper to do so, should absolve them from mining coal which they could not mine and sell except at a loss. One way, however, to avoid that, when you reach territory that can not be profitably mined would be to reduce the royalty to a point where the operator could afford to take out the coal. I hope the legislation is altogether proper, as the gentlemen from Oklahoma and the members of the committee seem to think it is, and in that view of it I hope it will pass.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the House ought to have an understanding of what this bill is. I am very much afraid that during the elucidation of his ideas on the general subject of conservation by the gentleman from Wyoming the House may have lost sight of the real proposition in the bill. There is not much information contained in the report on the bill; even the report of the committee or the report of the department. Both are very scant. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] has given us some information concerning the bill, and I have no doubt that he is in the main correct.

Here is a proposition to exempt from a lease certain land which is now under lease, on the ground that the land is not valuable for the purposes for which it was leased, and to insert in the place of that land other described land which is valuable for the purposes described in the lease. I suppose that no such proposition would be made to anybody else in the world except to the Congress of the United States. It has been our policy down to the present time not to lease these Indian lands for the coal privilege, on the ground that the coal royalty at present is not as high as it ought to be, owing to the competition of gas and oil which is very abundant in those regions. Yet, it is proposed here to give a special privilege to these two companies; one to obtain 360 acres additional coal land, and the other, I believe, 120 additional acres—a purely special privilege under existing leases. As to the terms of the lease no one has dared to produce a copy of it or the regulations of the department during the consideration of this bill, which is now up for the second time this week.

The department does not recommend the passage of the bill. The strongest argument which has been made in favor of the bill is that in the last Congress the bill passed both Houses, as they say, too late for the President to sign it. But it did not pass too late for the President to sign it; it passed in time for the President to sign it, but he did not sign it because there was doubt as to whether it ought to be signed.

A MEMBER. He vetoed it.

Mr. MANN. No; he did not veto it. It used to be called a pocket veto, but the bill reached the President late, and, as they say, the President did not have the time to determine about it. If the department had been in favor of the passage of the bill at the time it would not have taken more than two seconds to express that opinion and have the President sign it.

Now, we are brought up right short against the proposition: Does this House, as now constituted, propose to grant special privileges to special companies, by special legislation, authorizing the leasing or purchase of these coal lands at low rates? Only a year ago, when the Alaska proposition was before the House, the House expressed its disapproval of the bill which proposed to lease coal lands in Alaska at a rate not much less than the rate that is paid under this lease, this rate now being about 8 cents a ton.

I do not know whether it is the policy of a Democratic House to pass bills to authorize special corporations to have special privileges in the leasing of coal lands at special rates or not, but when there was a Republican House the bill was defeated.

True, it was defeated in part by Democratic votes, and the statement was then made on the floor of the House by an eminent gentleman of the Democratic persuasion that no coal lease ought to be made in Alaska with a royalty of less than 50 cents a ton. While I did not agree with him and do not agree with him now, and while it may be that the rate named here is as high as it should be, I think that when we lease coal lands in Oklahoma or elsewhere it ought to be done after competitive bids, with a right to reject all bids, and not because some company has secured heretofore under a system, I suppose, of competitive bidding, a lease of certain coal lands it shall now have the special privilege granted to it of obtaining other coal lands of more value at the same rate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all general debate on this bill close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all general debate close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, there is an old story floating around in the State in which I reside of a learned judge, at times a little irascible. In the course of a heated argument made by one of the older members of the bar, a colloquy ensued between him and the judge, who finally said, "You must be crazy." The lawyer retorted, "That may be, but the difference between your honor and myself is that occasionally I have a lucid interval." [Laughter.] The gentleman from Wyoming and myself are both intense conservationists, but I occasionally have lucid intervals, and this is one of them. [Laughter.] This bill does not seem to me to contemplate any very serious attack upon any conservation theory. It seems that this mining lease was heretofore granted to certain coal companies, covering certain land. It has developed that that land contains no coal at all, or coal of such character and quality or thinness of vein that it can not now be worked profitably, and the proposition in this bill is to transfer that lease to land that contains coal that can be worked.

As the gentleman from Wyoming has said, it is quite true that to mine coal that can not be profitably worked has a tendency to and does necessarily increase the cost of mining and makes all coal more expensive to the consumer. On this conservation question, and the question of recovery of all the coal that is in the mines, we have in Pennsylvania a very vivid and striking example. Anthracite coal, or, as it was first called, stone coal, was first mined in Pennsylvania in 1822.

At first it was used only in the large sizes. Then they began to find use for a little smaller size, and so on, from time to time, until now the very grains of coal are utilized. Anybody who will ride up the north branch of the Susquehanna River will see on either side of the train for about 50 miles vast mountains of the produce of coal mines, thrown out there, some of it, a half century ago, almost pure coal, but in such sizes that it was impossible to use it. It was composed of dust and small grains, that at that time could not be used. It was thrown out there and wasted. Some of these mountains of coal are on fire now and have been for years. From some of them they are beginning to wash and use the smaller particles of coal. They first used what is called steamboat coal, great blocks of coal, and then through breakers they broke it up, and finally used stove coal, and then a smaller size, known as egg coal, and then got down to a smaller size, called chestnut coal, and then, finally, pea coal and buckwheat coal, and now, by modern devices for getting air through it and preventing it from packing, they can use almost the dust that comes from the breaking up of the coal. Many gentlemen present pass through the city of Harrisburg, in which I live, on their way to and from their homes, but I doubt if any of them ever knew the fact that that city is heated and lighted by coal which is taken up by suction from the bed of the river in front of Harrisburg, it being the dust, small particles of coal, which are washed down in times of high flood by the streams from the mines 20 or 30 or 40 or 50 miles up the creek. In times of great flood the water washes down these banks of coal, which were thrown out as useless.

Now, they drain those pockets in the bottom of the river, where the coal settles and falls, and you will see almost every time you cross the river at Harrisburg, or ride along the river, these dredges, which are sucking the coal out of the water. The dredges draw up mixed coal and sand. The coal is sifted out and is burned in the steam-heating company's plant, and it makes the steam by which our houses are heated and the electric light by which the city is lighted. That shows the advance in the utilization of coal. In earlier days such coal could not be utilized at all.

Originally it did not pay. That product was not worth transporting from the mines to the market. To-day all sizes are used and all sizes are transported to tidewater. In the early days, if they had attempted to save all of that coal, it would have at least doubled to the consumers the price of the coal that was burned in the stoves. It could not have been done then, and I do not suppose that in Oklahoma these mines of coal could be mined if they attempted to mine all that was in the mine, for it would double the price of the coal to the consumer necessarily. It does not seem to me that by leaving whatever coal there may be in these 480 acres to rest until such time as there is such demand for coal in Oklahoma as will justify its profitable operation we will in any way interfere with the plan of conservation or with the interests of the Government. It is useless to try to make people spend money that they can not get back in getting something out of the ground for which there is not now an adequate demand. There are great quantities of oil and other fuels in the West, which make a smaller demand for coal, and consequently they could not sell it at a price which would justify mining it from these 480 acres of land, where the quality is poor and the vein thin.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. This coal company is not compelled to take the coal out of the land described in this bill, as I understand. That is, there is nothing in the lease to compel the coal company to dig this shallow vein of coal.

Mr. OLMSTED. No; but the gentleman from Wyoming argued that they ought to be compelled to do it.

Mr. BUTLER. But, as I understand from the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], there is nothing in the lease to compel this company to dig this coal after a period of five years.

Mr. OLMSTED. Very well; assume that.

Mr. BUTLER. Assuming that to be true, why should there be any legislation at all? Why should Congress be requested to relieve the company from doing something which it is not compelled to do?

Mr. OLMSTED. But there is something they want to do and something that the people out there want them to do and something that it is to the interest of the Government to have them do, and that is to mine some coal and pay a royalty for it and let the people have the coal.

Mr. BUTLER. But the gentleman understands that we are asked to so legislate that we will transfer a piece of coal land which has good coal in it, without consideration, for a piece of land that has not any.

Mr. OLMSTED. Oh, no. We are not giving them coal. They have to pay a royalty for every ton of coal that they take out.

Mr. BUTLER. If that be true, why should the exchange be made at all? Why not ask Congress to simply extend the territory?

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman from Oklahoma will accept such an amendment to the bill, as I understand.

Mr. CARTER. We are perfectly willing to accept that amendment if the gentleman insists upon it. It could not possibly be detrimental to anyone except, perhaps slightly, to the Indians, for it would simply tie up 480 acres of mountain land which otherwise might be sold and the proceeds divided.

Mr. BUTLER. Expressing my confidence in the gentleman from Oklahoma, I believe he can take care of the Indian much better than the Indian can take care of himself; but it seems to me strange that we should be asked to transfer a piece of ground back to the Indian and then give a piece of Indian ground to the company, the company not being compelled to dig the coal in the former place. Why the trade?

Mr. CARTER. I do not want to take up the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CARTER. The proposition is not complicated. We simply ask for 480 acres of coal-bearing lands for two coal companies, and for the release of 480 acres noncoal-bearing lands. It is asked for by both coal operators and Indians, and will be beneficial to both, besides developing the country. Now, if the gentleman insists upon the companies keeping this barren land, there would certainly be no objection on the part of the companies, because you could not compel them to take a ton of coal out of the mine at a loss. As a matter of fact, there is no coal in the land anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to permit the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Coal Co. to relinquish certain lands embraced in its existing Choctaw and Chickasaw coal lease which have been demonstrated to be not valuable for coal, as follows: Southwest quarter of the northwest quarter, south half of the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter, northwest quarter of the southwest quarter, east half of the southwest quarter, west half of the southeast quarter, south half of the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter, section 35, township 6 north, range 18 east; north half of the northeast quarter of section 2, township 5 north, range 18 east: embracing 360 acres, more or less; and to include within the lease in lieu thereof the following-described land, which is within the segregated coal area and unleased: Northeast quarter of section 36; east half of the northwest quarter of section 36, township 6 north, range 18 east; southeast quarter of southwest quarter and south half of southeast quarter of section 25, township 6 north, range 18 east; embracing 360 acres, more or less.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman from Oklahoma. If this bill is passed, the same agreement will be made for this piece of land that now exists for the one that will be turned back to the Indians.

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Therefore this company will only be required to dig a certain amount of coal for five years.

Mr. CARTER. The time in which the company was required to take out a certain amount of coal has passed. It expired during the first five years of the lease.

Mr. BUTLER. I would suggest to the gentleman, who is interested in these people, would it not be well to extend that limit? I know something, to my disadvantage, of a long lease of coal lands requiring a minimum tonnage. It puts the lessee on his energy and requires him to dig and hunt for coal on his lease. Why not make this limit 50 years and during the life of the lease the lessee shall be required to take out so much coal every year as a minimum tonnage?

Mr. CARTER. The present lease will expire within about 20 years, I should say, and beyond all question the coal sought to be taken by this bill will be completely exhausted before the lease expires. The coal which we ask for will be worked through tipples and openings already in use and which have been constructed for 8 or 10 years. The bill has been carefully considered in committee and I feel sure any further restriction is superfluous and unnecessary.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Oklahoma awhile ago to state that the Assistant Secretary or the assistant commissioner advised him that he was preparing a bill providing for the disposition of these Indian coal lands.

Mr. CARTER. As I remember, I said that I had a talk this morning with the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs and he told me he would confer with the commissioner for the framing of a bill to take care of just such cases as this without bringing it in the Congress.

Mr. MANN. That was not what I understood the gentleman to say, although I understood him to say that much. I understood him to say that they were preparing a bill providing for the disposition of these coal lands, I mean all lands that are reserved.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman either misunderstood me or I unintentionally misstated the case.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman what is his position on this question?

Mr. CARTER. On the lease or sale of the minerals?

Mr. MANN. On the lands that are now reserved?

Mr. CARTER. Does the gentleman speak in regard to sale or lease?

Mr. MANN. Well, either one.

Mr. CARTER. Well, I would favor a bill for the lease of the unleased mineral deposits in those lands under conditions that would be fair and equitable to the Indians. While I was for years in the past an advocate of the sale of this mineral to anyone who would buy and would be glad to see the Government purchase same now, I do not believe it would be fair to the Indians who own the property to offer it at forced sale right now on account of the bad condition of the market. The marvelous development of the Oklahoma gas and oil fields has practically put the coal operator out of business, and the Indian would not begin to realize anything near the value of his property. That is the only objection I have to selling.

Mr. MANN. I asked the question because it appears that a former Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Ballinger, reporting upon this bill, or a similar bill, stated:

It is not believed that any unleased lands should now be substituted for lands within existing leases if it be decided to make a speedy sale of the coal deposits with a view of expediting the final winding up of Choctaw and Chickasaw tribal affairs, etc.

And the present Secretary, or the Assistant Secretary, reporting upon this bill, has also stated:

If it be the purpose of Congress to authorize the immediate sale of the coal deposits of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, the propriety of permitting exchanges of this character might be doubted.

Of course, whether they are sold or leased does not make any difference as far as they are concerned.

Mr. CARTER. Of course I am not authorized to state the position of either Mr. Ballinger or Mr. Fisher——

Mr. MANN. They state their position very clearly here.

Mr. CARTER. Not on the subject I have in mind; but I have talked to both of them about this matter quite extensively. Mr. Ballinger's idea was that the coal mines should be sold to the highest bidder with proper precautions to prevent monopoly. Mr. Fisher's position, as I have understood it, is against the sale of this mineral at this time.

Mr. MANN. Well, this goes to the matter of whether these coal deposits are to be disposed of at an early date in some way or to be retained in the hope of getting a higher price or because there is not demand enough there now to warrant the opening of more mines.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman read again what Mr. Fisher said?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Adams, First Assistant Secretary, stated:

If it be the purpose of Congress to authorize the immediate sale of the coal deposits of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, the propriety of permitting exchanges of this character might be doubted. If, however, the sale of the coal deposits is to be deferred to some future time, it would seem entirely just and equitable to the lessees and profitable to the Indians to permit relinquishment of lands which have been proven not to bear coal and the selection of other segregated coal lands in lieu thereof. The lessees have necessarily expended considerable money in developing the mines, and should be allowed to reap some benefit from this expenditure by mining coal which may be reached from the developments thus made. The Indians would by such an arrangement receive an income from the coal mined.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. It does not seem that Assistant Secretary Adams makes any statement definitely as to what his position is, except under certain conditions. He simply states two contingencies and what should be done in either case. If the minerals are to be sold immediately, then, says the Assistant Secretary, "this legislation might be inopportune." I believe we might all agree on one thing, and that is the improbability of such sale in the immediate future, so that disposes of that contingency and leaves us to deal with this matter in the light of the other alternative, to wit, without prospect of immediate sale, and in that case the Assistant Secretary says he favors the bill.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. I notice in the first section of the bill the names of the two coal companies—first, the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Coal Co. Is that company in anywise connected with the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroad?

Mr. CARTER. Not in the least. The stock of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Coal Co. is owned by James McConnell and the estate of James Degnan and some other minor stockholders; but the stockholders of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. have no interest in this coal company. As a matter of fact, the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroad did not reach this section of the country until some time after this lease was made.

Mr. TILSON. I noticed the similarity of the names.

Mr. CARTER. Yes. I think it is an unfortunate name they have taken when it comes to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. TILSON. I am not prejudiced at all, I will state to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to permit the Eastern Coal & Mining Co. to relinquish certain lands embraced in its existing Choctaw and Chickasaw coal lease which have been demonstrated to be not valuable for coal, as follows: South half of the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter, southwest quarter of the northwest quarter, south half of the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter, northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 1, township 5 north, range 18 east, embracing 120 acres, more or less; and to include within the lease in lieu thereof the following-described land, which is within the segregated coal area and unleased: Southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 30, township 6 north, range 19 east; west half of the northwest quarter of section 31, township 6 north, range 19 east; embracing 120 acres, more or less.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUCKER of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration Senate bill 3686, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to permit the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Coal Co. and the Eastern Coal & Mining Co. to exchange certain lands embraced within their existing coal leases in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nation for other lands within said nation, and had authorized him to report the same to the House and recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that that committee has had under consideration Senate bill 3686, and reports it back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to correct a clerical error here. It should be "Nations" instead of "Nation," in the singular.

Mr. MANN. That should be an amendment to the title.

The SPEAKER. That comes afterwards. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to correct the last word of the title by making it read "Nations" instead of "Nation."

Mr. MANN. The word "Nation" occurs twice.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Just add the letter "s" to the word "Nation" where it occurs.

The SPEAKER. Where does it occur?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. In the last line of the title.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to permit the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Coal Co. and the Eastern Coal & Mining Co. to exchange certain lands embraced within their existing coal leases in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations for other lands within said nations."

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TOWN SITES OF TIMBER LAKE AND DUPREE, S. DAK.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up from the Union Calendar No. 138, the House bill 45.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 45) affecting the town sites of Timber Lake and Dupree in South Dakota.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MORRISON] in the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 45, with Mr. MORRISON in the chair.

On assuming the chair Mr. MORRISON was greeted with applause.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 45, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 45) affecting the town sites of Timber Lake and Dupree, S. Dak.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we ought to have the reading of it. It is only a short bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be set apart and reserved for school, park, and other public purposes not more than 5 acres of the lands not heretofore disposed of, within each of the town sites of Timber Lake and Dupree, in that portion of the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian Reservations in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, authorized to be disposed of under the act of May 29, 1908. Patents shall be issued for the lands so set apart and reserved for school, park, or other public purposes to the said municipalities of Timber Lake and Dupree: Provided, That the purchase price of all town lots hereafter sold under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior in the said town sites of Timber Lake and Dupree shall be paid at such times and in such installments and upon such terms as he may direct, and he shall cause 20 per cent of the net proceeds arising from such sales to be set apart and expended under his direction in the construction of schoolhouses or other public buildings or improvements in the respective town sites in which lots are sold.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE]. The bill pertains to his district.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of this bill I will say that in 1889 the Sioux Indians in South Dakota had in their reservation something like 20,000,000 acres of land. An agreement or treaty was made with them by which they ceded to the Government about 9,000,000 acres of that reservation, and the rest of the land was divided into six separate reservations. The Indians were to receive for the ceded land $1.25 an acre for all that was taken in the first three years under the homestead laws, 75 cents an acre for all taken in the next two years, and for the land disposed of thereafter 50 cents an acre.

The law also provided that there should be allotted to the individual Indians of grazing lands—and I may say it was all classified as grazing land—640 acres to each head of a family, 320 acres to each Indian 18 years of age or over, unmarried, and 160 acres to each Indian child under 18 years of age. The law also provided that from the proceeds of the sale there should be placed in the Treasury as a trust fund for the Indians the sum of $3,000,000. The proceeds other than the $3,000,000 were to be used in the support, civilization, and education of the Indians.

The law further provided that after the allotments were made the balance of the surplus lands that would be left after allotments were made might be disposed of under terms to be agreed upon with the Indians.

But it expressly provided that the lands should be disposed of to settlers under the provisions of the homestead law, the theory being that the Indians having taken their allotments it would be well to get white settlers adjoining the Indian allotments, first, for the purpose of having the Indian in contact with the white man in farming, and, secondly, to make the Indian allotments more valuable.

The first agreement made for the sale of surplus lands in one of the diminished reservations was an agreement for the sale of a portion of the Rosebud Reservation in Gregory County, S. Dak., the price of the lands being $2.50 an acre. Under the terms of the agreement there was $1,040,000 to be paid. Gentlemen who were Members of the House at the time that agreement came up for consideration will remember that there were objections to the ratification of the agreement, on the theory that the Government was a loser, that it was treating with the Indians for relinquishment of their title, whatever it might be, in the reservation, and then disposing of the land to settlers, and that we were giving the Indians more than we would receive from the settlers. Consequently we adopted at that time a new policy and provided in that bill that instead of paying the Indians the price which had been agreed upon, the price was to be raised somewhat, and as the lands were sold the proceeds were to go to the credit of the Indians. That bill became a law, and those lands were disposed of, and the Indians received $1,800,000 from the sale, instead of $1,040,000, which was the consideration they had agreed to receive for the cession that was made at that particular time.

Later, we passed another bill for the cession of a further portion of the Rosebud Reservation, and I being the author of the measure, it occurred to me that perhaps we could get a little more money in selling the land if we should provide for the reserving of some town sites and sell the town sites in town lots, and that we would get more money than we would by disposing of all the land as homesteads, as the 1889 treaty provided. So we provided that there should be certain town sites reserved, and that the proceeds from the sale of town lots should go into the Treasury to the credit of the Indians.

It seemed to me then—and I never have had occasion to change my mind—that under all the circumstances it would be only just, equitable, and right that a portion of the proceeds from the sale of those town sites should be used in the towns for public improvements, and that there should be reserved for school and park and other public purposes not to exceed 10 acres in any one town site. Those provisions were incorporated into that law, and it provided, as I have stated, that 20 per cent of the proceeds from the sale of the town lots should go to the municipality for the construction of schoolhouses, or other public buildings, or for public improvements. Since then this House has passed a bill, which has become a law, providing for the sale of the Fort Berthold Reservation, in North Dakota; also for the sale of Mellette County, in the Rosebud Reservation, in South Dakota, and Bennett County in the Pine Ridge Reservation, in the same State.

I may also say that a bill with a similar provision passed in relation to the opening for sale of some Indian lands in Oklahoma, near Lawton, some years ago. In fact, I think that was the first bill. Now, the law providing for the sale of the Cheyenne and Standing Rock lands in South and North Dakota, which passed in 1908, did not contain this provision as to a reservation for school and public purposes or for 20 per cent of the proceeds to be used by the municipality.

The purpose of this bill is to give to those two towns 5 acres for school and public purposes and 20 per cent of the proceeds, the same as these other towns have received.

I would say that when these two town sites were surveyed and laid out there were reserved, as shown by the plats, a number of acres for school and park purposes, and these reserved lands were so indicated upon the plats or maps of the towns. It was the opinion of the General Land Office that, under the general law, they had the right to reserve the land for those purposes, and the towns have constructed school buildings upon these particular school reservations, and the buildings are there to-day. Now, it seems to me only fair and right, and following the precedents that have been established in these other reservations, that we ought at least to let them have not to exceed 5 acres of the land. I will say that the bill has the approval of the department, and, personally, I can not see why there can be any objection to it.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I notice that the proviso of the bill on page 2, after providing that 20 per cent of the sums which are received from the sale of lots shall be used for the construction of schoolhouses and other public buildings, provides that this sum shall be expended by the Secretary of the Interior or under his direction. Does the gentleman think that provision is as wise a one as it would be to provide that this 20 per cent should be turned over to the municipality and the school district, in order that they may use the sums for the building of schoolhouses or making other improvements?

If the gentleman was not listening, I will repeat briefly, and say that the bill provides that the 20 per cent which is to be used for the benefit of the town shall be expended by the Secretary of the Interior in the construction of schoolhouses and other buildings.

It seems to me it would be better to turn the 20 per cent over to the municipality and the school districts, and allow the municipality and the school district to expend the money as they see fit.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It was merely for the purpose of knowing that it is used for that particular purpose. This will have to be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior. Otherwise it might be used, possibly, if it was turned over without any condition, for any purpose that the municipality might see fit, and the only reason for using that language is to see that the money is used for certain express purposes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is this the language of the other legislation to which the gentleman referred?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think it is.

Mr. MONDELL. This same matter is under discussion in connection with the town sites on the reclamation projects.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will allow me, page 3 of the House report says:

> The fixing of the same limit in this general act will tend to uniformity in legislation, always desirable; will, it is believed, sufficiently provide for the public needs, and will do no injustice to the Indians.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say that that letter has reference to a general bill on this subject; the department has recommended general legislation. This bill only provides as to these two town sites and reduces the amount of land to be used for schoolhouses and park purposes to 5 acres instead of 10.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And still it follows closely the language of the proposed general legislation.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes; practically the same thing.

Mr. MONDELL. Has the gentleman heard any complaint of the operation of the other legislation that he refers to?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I may say that there has never been any complaint that I have heard of from any source, and especially no complaint from the Indians.

Mr. MONDELL. The parties particularly interested are not the Indians, but the dwellers in the town.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I never have heard any objection from any source whatever.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. In relation to the question that the gentleman from Wyoming just asked, the bill seems to require that 20 per cent of the sale be retained and set apart and expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior—first, for schoolhouses; second, for other public buildings; and third, for other improvements, which, I assume, might be street paving, market houses, constructing sidewalks, public baths, or anything of that sort. Is the gentleman able to say how much land there is in these town sites that is available for lots?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. My recollection is that each of the two town sites consists of 160 acres.

Mr. MANN. How much has been sold?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In one of them, I presume, about a half, and in the other not so much.

Mr. MANN. On the half that has been sold this will lighten their taxes considerably in the way of building schoolhouses. They will not contribute anything toward this; they have purchased their lots. Probably they purchased the most valuable lots of the town. Out of the rest you are to retain 20 per cent. How soon is the rest likely to be sold?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That will depend on the conditions; it is under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, and he will sell them at such times as he thinks is advantageous to the Indians.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think they will be sold in time to build schoolhouses for the benefit of the people that are now there?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. My understanding is that schoolhouses are already built.

Mr. MANN. So that it does not require 20 per cent to construct schoolhouses; what other public buildings are there that need to be constructed?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman lives in a great city where the sale of city lots means usually considerable money. Now, 20 per cent of the sale of all of these town lots in these towns would not mean more than a few thousand dollars.

Mr. MANN. That does not make any difference.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not suppose that either one of these towns will have a population exceeding 1,000 or 2,000 people in the next 20 years.

Mr. MANN. If they already have schoolhouses built they will need no other public buildings unless it be a calaboose.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I presume under this law the cost of building the schoolhouses could be paid from this fund.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how they could be paid for from this fund when it says that the Secretary of the Interior shall cause 20 per cent of the net proceeds arising from such sale to be set apart and expended under his direction in the construction of schoolhouses or other public buildings or improvements. I do not see how he could pay debts already incurred for construction; he could not get by me if I was the auditor.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. He may use it for other purposes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The bill says:

He—

The Secretary of the Interior—

shall cause 20 per cent of the net proceeds arising from such sales to be set apart and expended under his direction in the construction of schoolhouses or other public buildings or improvements in the respective town sites in which lots are sold.

Mr. MANN. I have just read that. That does not mean he must pay debts which have already been incurred. It does not say that, whatever the gentleman may have in mind. Suppose some lots are not sold for 20 years, what is this 20 per cent to be used for?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. For public purposes.

Mr. MANN. By the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Under his direction. The Secretary of the Interior might turn the money over to the municipality if, in his judgment, he thought it was wise to do so.

Mr. MANN. I will not say that it could not be done, although I do not see how it could be done under the language which requires the money to be expended in the construction of buildings, and so forth.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that I was endeavoring to absolutely make sure that the money should only be used for the purpose that was contemplated when we passed the law, and therefore I was keeping it under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior rather than paying the money over to the municipality.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from South Dakota will understand that I am not criticizing. I am asking for information. I thought possibly the gentleman might know what was done in the case of the Lawton lots. I think that is the only other bill of this kind we have passed.

Mr. FERRIS. They built two schoolhouses.

Mr. MANN. Who built them?

Mr. FERRIS. The Secretary of the Interior sent two men down there from here.

Mr. MANN. What do they do with the money that comes in now?

Mr. FERRIS. It goes into the Indian fund.

Mr. MANN. I am speaking of the 20 per cent; the Secretary of the Interior still retains 20 per cent for public improvements?

Mr. FERRIS. I think he has expended the most of it.

Mr. MANN. He can not expend it before he gets it.

Mr. FERRIS. No; but most of it is paid in.

Mr. MANN. Are the lands all sold?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, they were sold all at once, at auction.

Mr. MANN. That is not the case here; that is a different situation.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I think it is contemplated in the law opening these lands to settlement that within a certain number of years after the passage of the act all of the land must be sold, including all town lots, and the Secretary of the Interior is required to dispose of the unsold lands and lots to the highest bidder, regardless of price.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman understands, I think, my reason for making these inquiries, so as to bring the matter before the House. This matter has recently been up in the Senate, which body defeated a bill because this provision was in it, and afterwards, on a reconsideration, the gentleman in charge of the bill struck the provision out and the bill passed. The gentleman knows the bill to which I refer—a bill relating to the Standing Rock Indian Reservation—and knows that there is now pending in the other body a general bill providing for this same 20 per cent and also for the school site, and so forth, which has not passed because some objection was made to it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I understand that there is such a bill pending; yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will permit, I will state that the last clause of this bill provides that this money may be expended for such improvements in the respective towns, and so forth, and that would include, as I understand it, the building of bridges, sidewalks, or anything of that sort which would be a charge upon the public.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but who would build them—the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They would be constructed under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the gentleman, in regard to the action of the other body, that I am quite sure they did not understand the proposition, and that when they do understand it that body will reverse itself upon this question, upon which it has heretofore voted affirmatively on a number of occasions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is somewhat in error when he says that the other body did not understand the proposition. Far be it for me to ever assume that the Senate of the United States does not understand every proposition, and I am quite sure that the Senate thoroughly understood the proposition when they voted upon it. Whether they appreciated entirely the position which the gentleman assumes and the necessity for this legislation is another proposition. As I understand the principle of this bill, it is based upon the idea that by setting aside a portion of the town site for school and park purposes, and then providing in advance for a retention of 20 per cent of the receipts of the sale for the building of these public improvements, it is expected that the lots will sell for more than would be received if you took the other course.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is exactly the proposition; and the theory upon which this provision was incorporated in the first bill that I had to do with was if I owned land myself and was going to dispose of it, and was going to lay out some town sites, as a business proposition it would pay to reserve a limited portion and donate it to the municipality for school and park purposes, and also give the municipality a certain per cent of the proceeds.

Mr. MANN. In these town sites, when they lay them out, do they lay out streets?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Well, somebody in some other body may think that that is depriving the Indians of their lands, because nobody pays for the streets.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman, of course, will take into consideration the fact that the Indians do not own this land. They have only the right of occupancy. Furthermore, the proceeds do not go to the Indians directly, but are simply used by the Government for their support and civilization——

Mr. MANN. For their support and toward their civilization.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman can construe it any way he desires. In the appropriation bill which the Committee on Indian Affairs has reported we provide that for the support and civilization of these particular Indians the expense shall be paid from the proceeds of the sale of the lands, and if we followed the provisions of the treaty we would dispose of them under the homestead laws entirely and would not have any town sites at all.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am favorable to the legislation and will vote for it in just the form in which it is reported, but I want to make this observation: It is entirely proper that these towns should have a proportion of the sums received from the sale of the town lots, because if this town site belonged to an individual or a corporation during all of the years during which the unsold lots were lying there they would be paying taxes to the municipal treasury.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is right.

Mr. MONDELL. And to the treasury of the school district; this 20 per cent of the sum received may be considered in lieu of taxes, and I think in a majority of cases would not be a sufficient amount to reimburse the municipality for the taxes which it would otherwise receive.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And furthermore, the Indian has the benefit of the schools and pays no taxes for 20 years.

Mr. MONDELL. All very true. So there is no question about the propriety of giving the municipality 20 or 25 per cent of the sums derived from the sale of town lots; but it does seem to me that it would be very much better to give that sum to the municipality and to the school district and allow them to use it in any way they saw fit for municipal or school purposes. Of course they could use it for no other purpose except proper municipal or school purposes.

But if they have the schoolhouses built and want to use the funds as they would use any other fund derived from taxation, to pay school-teachers, I do not see any reason why they should not do so. If they want to grade streets instead of building a city hall I do not see any reason why they should not be permitted to do so; if they want to build bridges within the municipality, why not? We are giving them these moneys in lieu of taxes which they would otherwise receive during the years when the town lots are there unsold, and they ought to have the same right to use those funds as they would have to use other funds they would receive from taxation in any legitimate and proper way. I think they would get more out of it in that way than they would if we left it to the Secretary of the Interior, necessitating the sending out of an agent from the Interior Department to supervise the expenditure at considerable expense, and all that. I believe it would be very much better to turn this over to the school district and municipality.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I am speaking in the time of the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. FERRIS. I trust the gentleman from South Dakota will yield me some time.

Mr. MONDELL. While I am not insistent upon that, I want to call it to the attention of the committee, because the same question will be before us before long in regard to the town sites on the reclamation projects. There we have the same problem. The Reclamation Service is selling town lots slowly, selling only a few lots at a time as there is demand. That means the municipalities have a limited source of income, and they ought to have a portion of the sum received from the sale of town lots, and those sums ought to go to the municipality and the school districts direct.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In these cases where half the lots have been sold without the 20 per cent being deducted, does not the gentleman think, in fairness, the improvements which are yet to be made out of the 20 per cent which is deducted from future sales should be made so as to give special benefit to the lots which will pay that 20 per cent?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, in theory the gentleman is absolutely right. I doubt if in practice it would not be difficult to carry that out, but I assume if we turn over the money to the municipality the municipality will spend it, as they do their general fund, for the benefit of the municipality.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but not for the benefit of the lots that pay the bill. Would not lots be likely to sell higher, for instance, if they had any bridge or sidewalk if the purchaser understood 20 per cent of the purchase will be used in their part of the town?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I think that is probably true; but I think it would be just a little difficult to provide for such expenditure, and the gentleman realizes that if this fund goes into the municipal treasury and becomes a part of the general municipal fund, of course all the expenditures which are made will be made for the benefit of the town generally, and therefore the property that has been sold heretofore, as well as lots that will be sold hereafter, will receive the benefit. My view is that the moneys would be more economically expended, and they would be expended for the purposes of more immediate necessity if they were turned over to the municipality to be expended for municipal purposes rather than retained in the hands of the Secretary to be expended under what must of necessity be a more or less expensive supervision.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota to ask a question.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the criticism of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to the concluding part of the bill is worthy of consideration. The language is:

> Twenty per cent of the net proceeds arising from such sales to be set apart and expended under his direction in the construction of schoolhouses and other public buildings or improvements in the respective town sites in which lots are sold.

I have been studying it for some little time, and it seems to me conclusive that the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized only to expend money in future construction. I understand from the gentleman from South Dakota that these schoolhouses desired to be built have already been built and it is desired to pay for them. Now, if that is the case, I would suggest, which is a suggestion merely, that there be stricken out the words "under his direction in the construction" and substitute therefor "expended in payment of the cost of constructing schoolhouses." He can pay for the cost of schoolhouses already constructed when he could not go ahead and construct schoolhouses.

Mr. MONDELL. Why not turn it over to the municipalities?

Mr. MILLER. If I may be permitted to answer that, I think there are some very strong reasons why this might be paid over to the municipalities. I think, on the other hand, there are stronger reasons, especially in the present instance, why it should not be. New municipalities are always extravagant if you let them have full sway in the matter of public buildings and improvements. They are inclined to build streets where streets are not needed; they are inclined to pave streets that nobody lives upon. I have myself recently visited cities of considerable importance, cities whose inhabitants are many thousands, that have streets paved 3 miles out into the country.

Mr. MONDELL. Boom towns?

Mr. MILLER. They have been boomed, but the boom did not carry the town out to those regions. It seems to me a wise precaution that this 20 per cent should be retained within the jurisdiction and power of the Secretary of the Interior or some Federal Government official, and that such official should expend it, or see that it is properly expended.

I, for one, think it ought to be almost exclusively used in the construction and equipment of schoolhouses. Why? Because a schoolhouse is the first public building any community ought to have. It is the first public building any community ordinarily does have, excepting, in some instances, a church, the two usually going hand in hand. In these new communities that are inside of the Indian reservations there must be school facilities afforded for the Indian children, and I think we have learned one thing, if not anything else, in relation to the Indian question, and that is that we solve the Indian problem, in part at least, by getting the Indian children to go to school with white children. Therefore in these communities the Indian children ought to be encouraged to go to white schools; facilities ought to be afforded for them to go to white schools; and this, in some measure, is compensation to these communities for the instruction given to these Indian children. I think it proper, therefore, that it should be restricted to schoolhouses; but whether thus restricted or not, it can hardly ever be more than sufficient to pay for these two schoolhouses that have already been built.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the House ought to be thoroughly informed of the proposition that it is voting upon, because the matter may come up in conference at some time when there is not very much opportunity for discussion.

Senate bill 109 is now pending before the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House. It has not yet been reported. That bill was brought up in the Senate and discussed on the 20th of January. At that time it contained this provision:

> And he is hereby authorized to set apart and reserve for school, park, and other public purposes not more than 10 acres in any town site, and patents shall be issued by the Secretary of the Interior for the lands so set apart and reserved for school, park, and other purposes to the municipality legally charged with the care and custody of lands donated for such purposes upon receiving satisfactory evidence that said towns have been duly incorporated.

It also contained this provision:

> And he shall cause at least 20 per cent of the net proceeds arising from such sales to be set apart and expended under his direction in the construction of schoolhouses or other public buildings or improvements in the town sites in which such lots are located.

I would be very glad to be able to hear myself.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What bill is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. MANN. Senate bill 109, pending before the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware that that is just what is proposed to be done in the pending bill?

Mr. MANN. I am aware of that. I have read what the gentleman from Texas says is the precise language that is in the pending bill. I have read it from Senate bill 109. When that bill was under consideration in the distinguished body at the other end of the Capitol, after considerable discussion on these two propositions—the discussion being wholly in regard to the two propositions which I have just read, and which are the same as in the pending bill—the bill was placed upon its final passage and defeated, for the reason that it included those two propositions. Subsequently a reconsideration of the bill was had, and on the 1st of February it was amended by striking out of the bill the provisions which I have read, which the gentleman from Texas says are precisely the same as those in the bill now pending in this House.

Mr. MONDELL. Are those the provisions for the 20 per cent to be used by the Secretary for the building of schoolhouses and other buildings?

Mr. MANN. Yes. One of them was for the 20 per cent and the other was for the park lands, school sites, and so forth. That bill has come over to the House and has not yet been reported.

Now, I do not undertake to say that the Senate was right in its contention on this matter. It seems to me quite proper, under the provisions which guard it, that when we authorize the sale of a piece of Indian land as a town site, or any other land, we may properly say that the streets shall be dedicated for public use; that a portion of the land may be reserved for school sites or park purposes, and where it is a new town, the proceeds of a portion of the sales within at least a limited period may be retained for the purpose of building schoolhouses, or a town jail, or something of that sort.

I do not quite understand why we should keep up that proposition and retain 20 per cent of the proceeds which may be collected some time hence unless it is on the principle of recuperating the towns for the lack of collecting taxes against the lands.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not that the only principle upon which we can properly make these payments to the municipality?

Mr. MANN. No. The principle upon which we make these payments is that the land will sell for more, if we reserve a part for a school site and park and dedicate a part of it for a street and build a schoolhouse. We have no right to take the property of the Indians which is not taxed in the end and give it to somebody else because we have not taxed it. We have a right to provide that it shall be taxed. I do not see any right on our part to take the property of the Indians unless it is that the rest will become more valuable and produce more revenue.

But I want the House to be advised of the situation, so that when the Members vote upon this bill they will understand the position here. The Senate took quite an opposite view. If this bill goes to the Senate, with their position on the matter, and we have a bill pending here, where we have not expressed any opinion upon it, and there is another general bill pending, we had better find out, so that everyone in the House or those who are especially interested in the subject, such as the gentlemen here to-day, will know "where they are at."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman suggests that there ought to be a time limit beyond which the Government ought not to be allowed to retain the 20 per cent. Is it not customary for them to sell the lots at auction after a given period of time?

Mr. MANN. I do not think so. It has sometimes been done, but not always. Take 160 acres divided up into town lots in a small town, and nobody has any earthly use for those lots in a country town when it is first organized, unless it is a county seat or something of that sort. I am the owner of lots in some small towns myself and have always considered them and still consider them a liability and not an asset.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD certain addresses delivered by Gov. Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey.

Mr. KENDALL. Are they on the question of schoolhouses?

Mr. MANN. He wants to extend the remarks of a schoolmaster.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this have anything to do with the schoolhouses that are proposed to be constructed on these reservations?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I have not read this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the gentleman read the speeches?

Mr. FINLEY. What is the gentleman's request?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing certain speeches referred to in his request. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMPBELL. How many of these speeches are there?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Three.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Are they all three on the same subject, or do they relate to different matters?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. They relate to different matters..

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from Kansas will not object, because I think the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] ought to have the opportunity to justify the existence of his candidate for the Presidency after what I put in the RECORD yesterday, which will be very difficult to overcome if he is nominated.

Mr. MADDEN. I shall not object.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The speeches referred to are as follows:

ADDRESS BY GOV. WOODROW WILSON AT THE BANQUET OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE OF COMMISSION MERCHANTS AT THE ASTOR HOTEL, NEW YORK, ON JANUARY 11, 1912.

MR. TOASTMASTER, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: I find myself embarrassed in view of the fact that your toastmaster did not announce the subject upon which I am to address you, but fortunately it is printed upon your program, namely, "Business and Politics."

There are two reasons why I am embarrassed: One is that there is so much to attract the eye in this audience and the other is that it distracts the thought. I am reminded by contrast of a limerick which one of my daughters introduced to me the other day. It runs:

For beauty I am not a star,
There are others more handsome by far,
But my face, I don't mind it,
For I am behind it,
It's the people in front that I jar.

I hope, in the circumstances, that you will survive the shock. Moreover, the theme is so great that I would not venture to speak of business in the presence of business experts, and the less said about politics the better. To address myself to so great a theme at this time of the evening would show I had audacity, which I assure you I do not possess. I am very much in the position of the old negro who fell asleep in a railway train, and as he slept his head fell back and his mouth was wide open. A fellow traveler happening to have some quinine put it on the darkey's tongue. It was some time before it soaked in, and when he did wake up with the consciousness that something had happened, he became very much excited, and said to the passenger, "Boss, is there a doctor on this train?" The gentleman answered, "I don't know; what do you want a doctor for?" and the negro said, "Boss, I done believe ma gall's busted." I have not the gall to address you on this subject, and then I have thought as I sat here and looked upon this company of business men how few of us realize what business life in America means. It means the constant readjustment to new conditions. America is one of the countries in which business seems almost to have no laws that run from generation to generation, because the organization of business, the form of business, and the objects of business seem to be transformed so rapidly.

You realize, of course, that in something less than two years the routes of trade will probably have altered once for all on this continent. That ditch that is so nearly completed between the Atlantic and Pacific will switch the route of trade around almost as thoroughly as it was switched when the Turks captured Constantinople and blocked the course of the Mediterranean, and sent the venturesome seamen down the coast of Africa to discover a route around the capes. You know at that moment England, which had been at the back of the nations trading with the East, suddenly swung around and found herself occupying a place at the front of the nations, for hardly had those mariners gone down the coast of Africa when other sailors, more venturesome still, looked seaward across the unexplored waters of the open Atlantic, then set out and discovered a new continent, made new territory for the trader, new trade for the politician, and so England, that had been upon the edge of the water, darkened by ignorance, presently found all her skirts flooded with the light of the new continent arising out of the waters of the sea. Something not so great as that, but nevertheless as revolutionary in our trade, is going to happen as soon as the canal is opened. And when you reflect upon the great projects afoot on this continent, the great inland waterways that we have made up our minds to build, you will see that we have intended nothing less than the transformation of our economic life, and with the transformation of our economic life there will necessarily be a vast readjustment.

Your thoughts will have to be very nimble and your plans quickly changed after the year 1913. Are you ready to do it? Do you realize what the future of America is going to be from the point of view of trade? As I sat here to-night I was thinking of you as commission merchants and reflected that most of our science in regard to trade in this country had been a science of omission rather than commission. Most of the things we ought to have done we have not done. You know that the singular thing about America is that with a genius for new things, with inventive genius, with a capacity for organization hardly matched before in the history of the world, we, nevertheless, have drawn our own borders close about us, have made ourselves shut-in patients, have confined our energies to a continent when we might have extended them into a world. We went almost deliberately about the destruction of our own merchant marine. We swept our own flag from the seas, and while we thought that we were a little Nation a hundred years ago, just before the War of 1812, we competed with the greatest nations in the world in the carrying trade as between nations. Now we, practically the greatest Nation in the world, compete with nobody in carrying trade. We retired from the stage upon which we had already made conquest and, turning our eyes upon ourselves, stood willing to compete with no one until we had developed our own resources.

What is the consequence? It is one unparalleled in the history of the world. We wasted our own resources. We have believed that you do not have to husband your resources, that you can just scratch the surface of your mines and then go on to another mine; that you can cut your forests down for bark on the trees in order to make tan bark and then leave the whole noble trees to rot with the wood never used. We have confined ourselves to a sort of prodigal waste, which sooner or later will find us unprepared in the competition with the rest of the world. No man can compete in the great contests of the world in trade and manufacture who has not learned how to husband his resources and use every scrap of his raw material. We have been a prodigal people and yet have prided ourselves that we have a genius for industry, a genius for spending, if you will, a genius for getting, if you will, but not a genius for the niceties of industry.

Why is it we have never had, even according to our own account, great native literature in America? We have had great writers, great prose writers and great poets, but it is our own complaint that we have never produced a great native literature characteristic of America but have merely carried on and explained the traditions of England. In order to answer that question you have only to look at the progress of American civilization as a whole. You can't have a great work of art if you try to make it in a hurry. No great work of art is made with the flat hand. It is made with the nicety of touch that comes only with pains and with infinite care. Nothing is artistic that is not patiently completed, professionally completed down to its minutest detail. You can not make a great sentence unless you love the cadences of the language, unless you look for those words which will heighten the color, release the light, and mark everything you say with such vividness that men shall keep it forever in their memory. You can not do great things unless you master the natural processes by which they are dominated. The world determines what you are to do; you don't determine what the world is to do. All the conditions are changing. It was just now said very truly in your presence that a man who can not change his mind gives the most capital evidence that the modern world can offer of his profound ignorance, because if your mind don't change while the world is changing, then your mind won't match the world's. If the whole economic civilization is in flux about you and you alone are crystallized and steadfast, then you will either be washed away by the flood or your position will become one in which you are serviceable only to have some worn-out craft moored to to go to rot. A friend of mine was traveling in Florida and was very curious to identify Florida crocodile. He asked a Florida gentleman how he should know one. "Well," said the friend, "if you are going through the swamp and see a brown object in the distance you will know it's either a stump or a crocodile. If it moves it's a stump."

Now, American trade has a good many crocodiles—men to whom a new thing is an incredible thing, an undesirable thing, a thing to be afraid of. If you don't learn by experience, experience will see that you don't have much time to learn anything. Some people think conservatism is to let things alone, but suppose they change overnight so that you can not recognize them? An English writer used this illustration: If you want a white post to remain white, do you let it alone? If you do it won't be a white post long; it will be a black post. You have got to renew that post once every so often if you want to keep it what it was—a white post.

Now, in order to keep our civilization in repair, in order to keep our trade good and to keep our industries vigorous we have got to change them every month of our lives. I am willing to let things alone if you will guarantee that I can go to sleep and be able to recognize the same thing in the morning; but unless you guarantee me that things will not stand still I am not content and want to be part of the proposition to protect the industries of America. Everything depends upon some nice process for which you have to employ experts, and you must look to the scientific schools of the country to enable you to advance a single inch. You can sit in your office and determine what is to be done, but you can not do it. You have got to hire training; you have got to employ knowledge; you have got to give salaries to science in order to accomplish anything in America; and now you are finding, those of you who are manufacturers, that you did not even know how to keep your cost sheets; that you can not tell what a particular division of your business costs you, and whether it pays its own expenses or not; that you have not yet studied those niceties of readjustment, those niceties of management, which mean the difference between big or little profits or no profits at all, and that from this time out you have got to employ those brains which devote themselves to the niceties of detail. That's the future of America, not only so as to these niceties of detail, but the man who produces is going to expect the same things of machinery as of exchange that he finds and establishes in his own factory. In other words, the model man has got to be something more than an expert. I say he has got to be something more than an expert even in American training.

Have you watched the foreign balance sheets? Do you know by what leaps and bounds foreign exports have increased? Do you know that since the Spanish War pushed us out into the political field of the world circumstances have pushed us out into the trade of the world? This trade which we have seemed to despise we are now bound to undertake. Have you noticed the different figures between what has happened in the exports of the natural products of the soil and the exports of our manufactured products? Don't you know that while we used to export a vast amount of grain and feed, the rest of the world is fast approaching the point where we will consume almost all of our own grain and that our exports of foodstuffs are falling off? Now, at the same time our exports of manufactured stuffs are increasing because while we are reaching the limit of productivity of supplying the world in our field, we have exceeded the amount of production in our factories which is necessary for the domestic consumption, and now unless we use the stuff and draw our borders in we must sell our manufactured products to the world. The middleman has to be an expert in the conditions of the world. I wonder how many Americans know what patterns of carpet can be sold in China. The average American salesman, I dare say, will try to ram American patterns down, I was going to say, Chinese's throats. They will try to get rid of all the surplus things suitable for America in countries for which they are not suitable, and it won't go. You must know something more than the geography of the world, you must know something more than establishing foreign lines with commission merchants; you must know the tastes of the civilized world, economic necessities must be learned, or else you will not be serviceable to America. We have ceased to be a provincial Nation. We have got men whose mastery extends to the borders of the civilized world. That's the reason I rejoice in associations like this. Working, each in his little field, staying within his home markets, men do not realize as to the economic readjustments but wonder whether New York is going to take toll of the whole world after the canal is opened; wonder whether New York is going to take toll of all the world after we have threaded this continent with great open waterways, when everything will be reasonably rapid and cheaply transported like the veins in a great vital body.

Now, whatever changes happen, you gentlemen must see them, must act upon them, must be the agents in them. I look upon the young men in this country as the prophets of what is going to happen. Elderly men get in a rut, elderly men refuse to conceive anything new. I once had the painful duty of telling a company of well-dressed people that I understood the object of the university to be to make the young gentlemen of the country as unlike their fathers as possible, by which I meant no disrespect to the fathers but that by the time a man is old enough to have a son he got so set in his ways that it is not possible to make any change for the rest of his life. We must have elastic, adaptable, malleable, young stuff to meet the exigencies of the changing age. Just as soon as America loses her elasticity, as soon as she loses her audacity and the adaptability of youth, the course of trade will be neglected, the process of our industry will be embarrassed. So we are at, I will not say the parting of the ways; we are at the opening of the ways. Our life is to have new channels, our economic processes are to take on new forms, for I call you to witness, gentlemen, that America up to this point has devoted herself chiefly only to one side of the great commercial and industrial process, America has been the scene of promotion and exploitation. Every kind of industry has been promoted in the technical sense of that word, and every resource of this rich country has been exploited in the literal meaning of that word. We have been promoters and exploiters. Isn't this coming to an end? Haven't most of the big enterprises been suggested and promoted, including some not worth promoting? Haven't we gone just about to the limit of the rough and ready exploitation of the resources of this country?

Now, what are we going to do? We are going to consider, as we are beginning to consider, scientific forms of government, skill, efficiency, economy; these things that do not come with native genius but come by training. It is all very well what you did. We haven't finished anything in America. I hope we haven't finished the governments of our cities; I hope we haven't finished our streets; I hope we haven't finished our work upon our great water courses in which we have dumped all the débris of our civilization and congested them until they run with difficulty, murmuring against us. We have not been careful of anything except to make haste, except to grow fruitless, and now we are paying the penalty. It has become vulgar in the United States to be rich. Some years ago I went to the commencement of a school which was attended, I understood, practically only by the sons of very rich men, because the courses at the school were so conducted that no others could attend. I felt bound to say to these youngsters that I looked upon them with a great deal of pity and sympathy, because in all probability they were foredoomed to obscurity; that the mere possession of wealth did not any longer lead to distinction in the United States; that in order to be distinguished you have to do something and if you were born with wealth the probability was that you would not do anything, and therefore a man born rich in the United States was likely to be born unserviceable and, being unserviceable, was foredoomed to obscurity. Is it not so? Suppose you have a lot of wealth, suppose you have lavished the resources of the country upon your own bank account? Then what are you going to do with your bank account? What are you going to make of this America that you have adorned and petted and upon which you have spent the genius of organization and the energy and eagerness of development? You, gentlemen, are, so to say, the agents of all the distribution and of the readjustment which takes place, at any rate, in a large number of the products of this country. I remember when I was a youngster I was obliged to study the elements of political economy. I was taught that there were several kinds of value—that there was time value, which makes ice very valuable in the summer and coal very valuable in the winter, and that there was place value, and that a thing that was not serviceable in one place because there might be a surplus of it there was very serviceable in another where it was scarce or could not be produced. You are the servants of place value. It is your business to see that things are at the place where they are wanted at the time they are wanted. In that sense I must accuse you of being place hunters.

You are always looking for a market in which to place the product you deal in, and by the same token you must have a wide and general forecast upon the commerce of nations. You must forecast the changes that are going to take place; you must realize just how long a place is going to be the center and just when it is going to stop being the center. I remember a good many years ago I dined with a society in this city to which no one could belong whose ancestors had not lived in New York for, I think, 200 years, and I could not refrain from saying to the gentlemen assembled that I looked upon them with a good deal of curiosity, for while all the rest of America had been moving they had been sitting still for 200 years. Now, I am no prophet, but I am sorry for the man who can not see the visions of our time. If you think you knew American trade by heart last year, within a decade you will be out of business. You have got to know how American trade will be next year and the year after, a whole decade, of which these years are a part. You have got to have vision; you have got to look into the future; you have got to feel the full pulses which are beating in the great round world before you will comprehend the civilization of which you dream, of which you form a part. So this is what I call the statesmanship of business. Statesmanship is merely the organization of the common life in order to conserve the common interest. That is all statesmanship is, and statesmanship of business is organization of business to conserve the economic interest of your generation.

The same Englishman from whom I was just now quoting gives this very interesting definition of a statesman in a self-governing country. He says he is a man of ordinary opinion and extraordinary ability; a man who reflects the opinion of his generation, but has extraordinary ability in giving expression to that opinion. And so I challenge you, if you know what uses to make of your organization, not to suppose that business is going to dwell in your several commission houses. You have got to get limits outside of those houses; you have got to learn not only of your fellow commission merchants, but of men who have been to the ends of the earth, of travelers, scientists, politicians, of men who have dreamed the dreams that constitute the vision that men follow.

Do you know who are the leaders of mankind? The leaders of mankind are those who lift their vision from the dusty road under their feet and look forward, and though they are determined to keep a firm footing upon the road they nevertheless gladden their eyes with the illuminated distance, to those regions which seem to rise and rise, level by level, promising happier days for mankind, easier lives, more sympathy, more cooperation, more perfect mutual understanding, more common trust, more enthusiasm, more partisanship of what is good, more hatred of what is not good, more contempt for shams, more confidence in realities. They will redeem us from our errors and our mistakes, will show us that to open our eyes is to enlarge our trust, and will convince us that to lead men upon a great process of change is to keep open the love in their hearts in order to travel the road of perfection which comes only with applying ourselves to the things that are better; or, better, giving over to forgetfulness the things that are wrong. Why, gentlemen, do you know that the ancients shut themselves in and refused to trade with the rest of the world, for fear that in trading in goods they should also trade in ideas? Men did not admit foreign merchants to their markets because they said, "these men will contaminate us with foreign ideas," and so they strangled their own development for fear of the invasion of ideas not their own.

I congratulate you, gentlemen, upon being traders in the thought of the world, traders in the hope of the world, full of confidence that as you receive men into your thinking you will establish the supremacy of America as we wish it to be established—not by force of arms, not by the conquest of hope, not by the conquest of aggrandizement, not by conquest, but by the free injection of our enthusiasm, our love of mankind, our confidence in human liberty.

Are not the horizons large? Is not the prospect fair? Is not the trend beautiful when it leads us to these models of human achievement?

ADDRESS OF GOV. WOODROW WILSON AT DETROIT, JANUARY 18, 1912.

RELATED POLICIES.

Gov. Wilson said in part:

A few years ago, a few months ago, it was a matter of common remark that the field of our politics was singularly confused and disordered; party lines everywhere broken or breaking; party labels losing their significance; party combinations threatening to break and re-form themselves. But in recent months the scene has become more ordered and definite. Every careful observer can now perceive that certain great, definite, calculable forces are at work, the character of which is being more and more plainly disclosed, their movement and direction more and more clearly defined.

To many this changing scene has seemed ominous. They have feared that the foundations of our politics were being threatened with disturbance. They have thought that they saw in what was happening about them a peril to business and to all the fixed conditions of our life. Some had even fancied that these conditions had been artificially produced; they have thought that they discovered in them the artful work of demagogues and disturbers of the public peace; of men who wished to produce unsettled conditions and set the various elements of society at loggerheads with one another. They have thought that irresponsible agitators were producing these conditions in order to accomplish their own reckless purposes. But no one who views the scene calmly and in the large, no one who sees it steadily and sees it whole, can really believe that these great, almost universal, movements of opinion have been produced in any such fashion. I do not see how anybody who has really studied and comprehended the situation of the country and the actual conditions of politics can look forward to the outcome with anything but hope and satisfaction.

The great progressive sentiment which now more and more dominates the country and only awaits its opportunity to determine the policies of the Government is not accidental, is not merely a passing phase expressive of the temperament of an eager people. It is a thing that has arisen steadily by natural and inevitable force, like the tides of the ocean.

The most profitable thing that we can do in order to reassure ourselves is to ask why this great body of progressive opinion has grown so strong, why it has spread to almost every part of the country. The facts are unmistakable enough. The history of the present administration has illustrated them at every turn. We have seen an honest and patriotic man in the presidential chair struggling with the rising power, involved in greater and greater difficulties, because he did not understand that power or comprehend the great purposes that lay behind it, and yet unable to curb it and seeming in spite of himself to increase its volume by the very acts attempted to check it. What has happened? What is it that the stand-pat ranks of the Republican Party vaguely battle with? Why is the country attempting to break away from old party formulas and blaze a new path for itself in politics under a changed leadership and by new measures of reform?

Because within less than a generation all the economic conditions of life and business in this country have changed almost beyond recognition, while our politics have all but stood still. There has been much controversy. There has been loud shouting as if upon a field of battle. Hosts have contended with each other, with the wild beating of arms, one against the other, but few definite adjustments of policy to changed conditions have been accomplished. Some measures of reform there have been, but there has been no steady, consistent force to give them their full effect, to guide them, to adapt them to conditions all along the line. It is as if the rising waters of progressive sentiment had gathered deeper and deeper, higher and higher, behind the stand-pat dam. Because no one knew how to release them was to invite destruction. The sum of the matter is that our life has changed and that our policies are belated. Our laws lag almost a generation behind our business conditions and our political exigencies.

Those who insist upon undertaking the adjustment, those who argue that our laws should be brought up to date—to the date marked upon the calendar of our economic advance and change—are called radicals, not because they would change the facts, but because they would adjust the law to the facts. The maladjustment which they point out is so great that men are startled at the picture and think that only extreme and hasty and violent measures may be thought adequate to meet the extraordinary circumstances which "radical" reformers pitilessly point out.

There is going to be no Johnstown flood; the dam is made of good, stubborn masonry, is not going to give suddenly away. It is, on the contrary, going to be gradually replaced by well-considered constructive engineering with new, well-ordered channels, into which the released waters may pass and in which as they run they may be used to turn the machinery of a still greater industrial organization than that which we have so far built up—an organization more justly put together, an organization whose parts shall be assembled and operated in a way more suitable to free opportunity and untrammeled achievement.

While the waters have piled up, the sediment of passion has settled in them; they have grown clearer. We have had time to comprehend and to think. While sentiment has beat against almost insuperable obstacles and has seemed again and again to be baffled by them, we have been obliged to study both the rising forces and the withstanding barriers. We see more, and we see more clearly than we ever did before. We shall now be able to relieve the strain like true and thoughtful engineers. We shall conserve while we readjust.

I think that every candid observer will corroborate this view of the matter. I do not perceive in the United States any dangerous volume of passionate dissatisfaction. It seems to me that the air grows clearer rather than thicker. There is no sign of storm on the horizon, but there are many signs of a hopeful and a better day. Those who once contended that nothing was the matter are now admitting that a great deal is the matter; that much has been done in the world of business and in the money market that ought not to have been done. They are growing willing to discuss the matter, to confer, to admit the necessity for remedies, and while their temper has changed the temper of reformers has perhaps grown more sober. They are beginning to discuss the practicable means of change in a more direct and businesslike way.

Recent investigations have been of the greatest service. They have disclosed and are disclosing, item by item, just the methods of business which have been most harmful and most unjust. I think they have opened the eyes of the very men who gave the testimony. A system of business and a system of finance have been laid bare which are manifestly inconsistent with the welfare of big business no less than with the welfare of the country at large.

It is evident that while great fortunes have been piled up and a great business development forced the true, permanent, economic interests of the country have not been served. There has been something abnormal about the process.

We see that somewhere near the center of the whole trouble lies the great system of governmental favors, which we call the tariff. Round about the tariff has been built up a body of business undertaking in which control has been too much concentrated. In order to maintain this control it has been necessary to be secure of the patronage of the Government, and so business has gone deep into politics. Legislative action has been controlled by special business interests. Party machinery has been used to serve private purposes and to make sure pecuniary profits. The whole normal process of government has been reversed, and government itself has come to be privately owned. The phrase may be exaggerated, but it is only the brief epitome of a state of affairs the main facts of which are only too plain.

And so progressives are drawing together, not to destroy anything, but to effect a wholesome readjustment, not hastily, not by any too extensive plan which runs beyond what we see and know; but item by item we must set the Government free from private control and set business free from private control, so that the economic courses of our life may run free again, and that with their freedom we may return to individual opportunity and open the gates to fresh, untrammeled achievement.

And the means will not be a doctrinaire program, but common counsel. We must extend the lines of our debate to every class of society. We must by one means or another hold a grand assize again of the whole Nation. We must find spokesmen for every class and interest, and with open mind go step by step toward the consummation we seek.

Surely this is a program to quicken every pulse and to draw all thoughtful, energetic, capable, patriotic men together for a common effort in the service of the country and of humanity. This is the gospel of the progressive.

ADDRESS OF GOV. WOODROW WILSON TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF VIRGINIA AND THE CITY COUNCIL OF RICHMOND, DELIVERED ON FEBRUARY 1, 1912.

The home-coming of Gov. Wilson to his native State of Virginia was one of the most notable occasions in the history of the old Commonwealth. A Virginian born and educated, he came back at the invitation of the general assembly of the State and the City Council of Richmond and spoke to more than 4,000 people in the city auditorium. The audience numbered, among others, Gov. Mann, Lieut. Gov. Ellyson, Speaker Byrd, of the house of delegates, the members of the general assembly, Mayor Richardson, the City Council of Richmond, and distinguished citizens of the State from every section.

The most notable feature of the occasion was the presence of the Wilson Club, of Staunton, the birthplace of Gov. Wilson. They came to Richmond on a special train over 300 strong, and, headed by a band, marched in a body to the Jefferson Hotel, where the governor received and welcomed them.

The Richmond Times-Dispatch said:

"He could have hoped for no happier home-coming. * * * Welcomed to the capital city of his native State as one of the jewels of whom Virginia is justly proud, Gov. Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey, perhaps the next President of the United States, reported last night to his neighbors back home, in his own words, not about himself, but about the things he had seen while away."

He spoke as follows:

Your excellency, Mr. Speaker, your honor, gentlemen of the General Assembly of Virginia, and of the council of the city of Richmond, ladies and gentlemen: I face this great audience to-night with a mixture of emotions. I am glad to feel like a boy who has come home to report in some degree to his neighbors, not about myself, but about the things that I have seen or tried to see clearly happening in the great communities of which we constitute a part.

I am not going to hold the distinguished gentlemen who have introduced me responsible for the terms in which they have presented me to you. I am ready to believe, if anything should happen to me that is untoward, that they have uttered not a critical judgment, but have spoken according to the dictates of their hearts. They have been welcoming me home—they have not been telling you exactly what I am.

And yet the voice of a friend melts the heart and I, for my part, feel it very difficult here to-night to make an address from which the sentimental emotions that rise in me are left out. I have on my lapel a badge which, if I followed the dictates of good taste, perhaps I should not wear, for it bears my own name; but it was pinned on my coat by one of the delegation from Staunton, my native place [applause], and I know that you will indulge me in the sentiment which has led me to leave it there, not as a token of egotism, but as a token of my appreciation of the welcome which has been extended me.

You have been told to-night that the eyes of the Nation were centered upon me. I hope not. That is very awkward. [Laughter.] I do not like to believe that the eyes of the Nation are centered upon me. I do like to believe that the thoughts of the Nation are centered upon the great questions which I, among many others, have tried honestly and fearlessly to expound [applause], because we are just now seeking to show our devotion, not to persons but to a cause—a fundamental cause, a cause to which the whole history of America has been a commendatory example.

I could not stand before this audience of my one-time neighbors—for there are a great many men behind me, at any rate, if not in front of me, who have known me ever since I was a boy—and try to pose myself as an important figure. They would see through it. [Laughter.] I remember the story of an innocent old woman who went into the side show of a circus and saw, or supposed that she saw, a man read a newspaper through a 2-inch board. She got up in great excitement and said, "Here, let me out of here; this is no place for me to be with these thin things on." [Laughter and applause.] I fear that the disguise of greatness would be too transparent; and yet I do feel that every man should, who believes in the great ideals of this country and in their translation into action, stand up in every company and proclaim the faith that is in him, so that by common counsel and by common action we may achieve something for this great Nation.

I have heard men complain of the changes of the times. I have heard men counsel that we stand still and do nothing. How futile the counsel is. Do you remember the quaint story of the Scottish Highlander who went into the market at Edinburgh, followed by his dog? He went to a fishmonger's stall and the dog incautiously dropped his tail into a basket of lobsters, and one of the lobsters nipped his tail. Whereupon the dog went yelping down the street, with the lobster bouncing after. The fishmonger said, "Hoot, mon, whussle to your dog." "Hoot," said the Scotchman, "whussle to your lobster." [Laughter and applause.]

Now, if you think some of your leaders are going too fast a pace, don't whistle to them. Whistle to the spirit of the age. Whistle to the questions that have whipped their consciences and dominated their understandings. They can not stop if they are going to keep up with the great transmutations of affairs. For, gentlemen, whether we have realized it or not, we have entered a new age, and I have comforted myself with the thought as I journeyed toward Virginia again, that Virginia had never been daunted by a new age; with however debonair and young and confident a genius, Virginia led a great Nation and helped to create a great Nation in a new age. [Applause.]

I have heard men say that it was un-American to criticize the institutions we are living under. I wonder if they remember the significance of the American flag—the first insurgent flag that was flung to the breeze—the flag that represented the most colossal "kick" that was ever taken in political transactions; a flag that I can not look at without imagining that it consists of alternate strips of parchment upon which are written the fundamental rights of man, alternating with the streams of blood by which those rights had been vindicated and validated. [Applause.] In the blue sky of the corner there are swung star after star of Commonwealths of free men who were setting up their own homes upon the principles of those vindicated rights.

Do you suppose that I will believe, or that anyone knowing the history of America or the history of Virginia will believe, that it is inconsistent with being an American and a Virginian to propose that you construct liberty for each successive age, and that if necessary you reconstruct liberty for each successive age? If I had happened to get that breath out of my lungs in my absence from the Old Dominion it would enter them again as I came back to her. [Applause.] I have not lost it elsewhere. The wholesome contagion has infected the whole of the great Nation. Do not suppose that the people of New Jersey have not seen visions, and dreamed dreams. Some gentlemen in some initial quarters wanted to suppress the dreams. [Laughter and applause.] It made the sleep of some men, in some quarters, uneasy that they should be haunted by those visions, but they never went out of the thought or the sleepless eyes of those great multitudes of men for whom happiness depends upon freedom, for whom self-respect depend upon freedom and principle, and in New Jersey as everywhere else they have drunk of those fountains which first began to flow in Virginia, those fountains by which we constantly renew our youth, and devote ourselves generation after generation to the preservation of the institutions of America.

I want, if possible, to explain to this great body of thinking persons the age in which we live, as it seems to me to present itself. Why, ladies and gentlemen, in our age every question is new. Every question that faces America is just as new now as were the questions that faced America in 1776. I do not mean that we are upon the verge of a revolution. I do not mean that passion is stirring which will upset the ancient foundations of our political order; but I do mean that life has changed under our very eye, so that what we do will have to be adjusted to almost absolutely new conditions, and I want that you will bear with me to point out just what I mean.

You know that one of the great questions that faces this great country is the question of conservation. Now, just what do you mean by conservation? Do you mean the big thing, or do you mean the little thing? The little thing, though big in itself, but little by comparison, is the renewal of our forests, the protection of our great water powers against further depletion, the safeguarding of our mineral resources against waste and extravagance, the keeping in store as long as may be of those things which can not be renewed, and may even within a generation, some of them, come to the point of exhaustion.

That is the question of conservation as most men discuss it; but is that all? It seems to me that the fundamental question of conservation in America is the conservation of the energy, the elasticity, the hope of the American people. [Applause.] I deal a great deal with friends, for I have had such friends all my life, who are engaged in manufacturing in this country, and almost every one of them will admit that while he studies his machinery, and will dismiss a man who overtaxes the machinery so that its bearings get heated, so that the stress of work is too much for it, so that it is racked and overdone, not a man of them dismisses a superintendent because he puts too great a strain upon the souls and hearts of his employees. [Applause.] We rack and exhaust and reject the man machine, and we honestly, economically, thoughtfully preserve the steel machine; for we can get more men—we have only to beckon to them; the streets are full of them wating for employment; but we can not, without cost, get a new machine.

Now, that kind of conservation is a great deal more than the question of overstraining the factories. If I knew my business and were a manufacturer, what would I do? I would create such conditions of sanitation, such conditions of life and comfort and health as would keep my employees in the best physical condition, and I would establish such a relationship with them as would make them believe that I was a fellow human being, with a heart under my jacket, and that they were not my tools, but my partners.

Then you would see the gleam in the eye, then you would see that human energy spring into expression which is the only energy which differentiates America from the rest of the world. [Applause.] Men are used everywhere, men are driven under all climes and flags, but we have boasted in America that every man was a free unit of whom we had to be as careful as we would be of ourselves. America's economic supremacy depends upon the moral character and the resilient hopefulness of our workmen. So I say, when you are studying questions of conservation, realize what you have been wasting, the forests, water, minerals, and the hearts and bodies of men. That is the new question of conservation. I say new, because only in our day has the crowding gotten so close and hot that there is no free outlet for men. Don't you remember that until the year 1890, every 10 years when we took the census, we were able to draw a frontier in this country? It is true that in what is called the golden age, 1849, when gold was discovered in California, we sent outposts to the Pacific and settled the farther slope of the Rocky Mountains. But between us and that slope, until 1890, there intervened an unoccupied space where the census map makers could draw a frontier. But when we reached the year 1890 there was no frontier discoverable in America.

What did that mean? That meant that men who found conditions intolerable in crowded America no longer had a place free where they could take up land of their own and start a new hope. That is what that meant, and as America turns upon herself her seething millions and the caldron grows hotter and hotter, is it not the great duty of America to see that her men remain free and happy under the conditions that have now sprung up? It is true that we needed a frontier so much that after the Spanish War we annexed a new frontier some 7,000 miles off in the Pacific. But that is a long cry, and it takes the energy of a very young man to seek that outlet in the somewhat depressing climate of the Philippines.

So we now realize that Americans are not free to release themselves. We have got to live together and be happy in the family. I remember an old judge who was absolutely opposed to divorce, because he said that a man will be restless as long as he knows he can get loose [laughter], but that so soon as it is firmly settled in his mind that he has got to make the best of it, he finds a sudden current of peace and contentment. Now, there is no divorce for us in our American life. We have got to put up with one another, and we have got to see to it that we so regulate and assuage one another that we will not be intolerable to each other. We have got to get a modus vivendi in America for happiness, and that is our new problem. And I call you to witness it is a new problem. America never had to finish anything before; she has been at liberty to do the thing with a broad hand, quickly, improvise something and go on to the next thing; leave all sorts of waste behind her, push on, blaze trails through the forest, beat paths across the prairie. But now we have even to stop and pave our streets; we are just finding that out. I suppose it was good for the digestion to bump over the old cobblestones, but it was not good for trade, and we have got to pull up the cobblestones and make real sidewalks that won't jolt the life out of us. Let these somewhat whimsical comparisons serve to illustrate what I am talking about.

Now, there is another new thing in America, and that is trade. Will you laugh at me and say, "Why, America has been supreme in trade ever since she was created." Has she? We have traded with one another, but we have traded with nobody else in proportions worth mentioning. Yes; we have in grain, in the great foodstuffs, but do you know what is happening? Our foodstuff exports, our grain exports are falling, falling, falling, not because we produce less, but because we need more ourselves. We are getting nearer and nearer to the point where we will ourselves consume all that our farms produce. Then we will not have anything with which to pay our balance, will we? Yes, we will; because while our exports of grain have been falling, our exports of manufactured articles have been increasing by leaps and bounds.

But under what circumstances? Long ago, after we had forgotten the excellent things that the first generation of statesmen had done for us in America, we deliberately throttled the merchant marine of the United States, and now it is so completely throttled that you are more likely to see the flag of the little kingdom of Greece upon the seas than the flag of the United States. And you know that the nation that wants foreign commerce must have the arms of commerce. If she has the ships, her sailors will see to it that her merchants have the markets. I am not arguing this to you, I am telling you, for the facts, if we look but a little ways for them, will absolutely demonstrate this circumstance, that we have more to fear in the competition of England, Germany, and France, because of the multitude of English, French, and German carriers upon the sea than we have to fear from the ingenuity of the English manufacturers or the enterprise of the German merchants.

Anybody who has dealt with railroads knows what I am talking about. Railroads in America have made and unmade cities and communities, have they not? They would do it now if they were not watched by the Interstate Commerce Commission. We are obliging them to work without discrimination now, but they at one time discriminated as they pleased, and they determined where cities were to grow and where cities were to decay.

Very well. The same thing is happening upon the high seas. The foreign carrier can tell you where you can go and where you can not go. He can discriminate against you and in favor of his own merchants and manufacturers, and he will, because he does.

And while all this is going on, and we lack the means, we are fairly bursting our own jacket. We are making more manufactured goods than we can consume ourselves, and every manufacturer is waking up to the fact that if we do not let anybody climb over our tariff wall to get in, he has got to climb to get out; that we have deliberately domesticated ourselves; that we have deliberately cut ourselves off from the currents of trade; that we have deliberately divorced ourselves from world commerce; and now, if we are not going to stifle economically, we have got to find our way out into the great international exchanges of the world. There is a new question.

I was speaking in Boston the other evening at a real-estate exchange, and I asked those gentlemen what is going to keep real-estate values in Boston steady? I asked them if they realized what was likely to happen after the year 1915. You know that in that year it is likely that the great ditch in the Isthmus will be open for commerce. We are not opening it for America, by the way, because we haven't any ships to send through it; we are opening it for England and Germany. [Applause.] We are pouring out American millions in order that German exporters, English exporters, and French exporters may profit by our enterprise; and when that is done, of course something is going to happen to America. I asked those gentlemen in Boston if, after that was done, the arteries of trade in this country would continue to run east and west? Some great arteries are going to open north and south. The great valley of the Mississippi is to be the home of teeming industries and of a ceaseless commerce. And then I wonder sometimes if it will not be colder still in the northeastern section of this country where Boston is situated. Those east winds, of which they are fond, will not bring them increasing commerce, perhaps, but they will hear the throb of that great heart in the center of the continent, which is shifting the center of gravity, which is throwing into different arteries the course of the blood of the great commercial world. Does that strike you as something happening in America that you can not sit still and neglect? Hadn't you better "whussle to the lobster"? Don't whistle to the dog, but whistle to the lobster, if you think it will do any good, but I have never enticed a lobster by whistling.

There is another new question in America, and that is the question of business. Business is in a situation in America that it was never in before; it is in a situation to which we have not adjusted our laws. Our laws are still meant for business done by individuals; they have not been satisfactorily adjusted to business done by great combinations, and we have got to adjust them. I do not say we may or may not, I say we have got to, there is no choice. If your laws do not fit your facts, the facts are not injured, the law is damaged; so much the worse for the law, because the law, unless I have studied it amiss, is the expression of the facts in legal regulation. Laws have never altered the facts; laws have always necessarily expressed the facts, adjusted interests as they have arisen, and changed to one another.

When before, in the history of America, were the Congress of the United States and the legislature of every State called upon in every session to intervene in the regulation of business? Never before our own age.

Now, why is all this happening? Why has business taken on a new aspect in America? Why does it wear a face with which we are only by degrees becoming familiar? For a very interesting reason. An ever-diminishing circle of men exercise a control in America with which only the Government itself can compete.

I am not one of those, ladies and gentlemen, who speak of the interests in big letters as if they were enemies of mankind. I know the natural history of the interests, and they grew just as naturally as an oak grows; some of them grew just as naturally as a weed grows. [Laughter.]

I am not here to enter an indictment against business. No man indicts natural history. No man undertakes to say that the things that have happened by operation of irresistible forces are immoral things, though some men may have made deeply immoral use of them. I am not here to suggest that the automobile be destroyed because some fools take joy rides in it. I want to catch the fools. I am not here, in other words, to suggest that the things that have happened to us must be reversed, and the scroll of time rolled back on itself. To attempt that would be futile and ridiculous. I am here to point out as clearly as I can what I believe to be the facts, and what most of you know to be the facts, because some of you have been considering these things longer than I have, and I have no doubt that you have seen things clearer in 20 years than I have seen them in 20 months. I am not talking about things distant; I am talking about things that I have seen with my eyes and handled with my hands.

Now these things, if you will allow me to express them briefly—and to express them briefly means to express them imperfectly—these things amount to this, that a comparatively small number of men control the raw material of this country; that a comparatively small number of men control the water powers that can be made useful for the economical production of the power to drive our machinery almost entirely; that that same small number of men, by agreements handed around among themselves, control prices, and that that same group of men control the larger credits of the country.

Do you know that nobody can undertake the larger kind of undertakings without their approval and consent? There are very few men who can afford to stand up and tell you that, because there are very few men in my happy condition. I have not any note in bank. [Applause.] I live within my income and I can not be punished for what I say. [Applause.] But I know perfectly well, and I have been told by men who dared not speak above their breaths with regard to it for fear they would be punished, that I could not start a great enterprise in this country that needed a million or more of money to start it unless I made an agreement and combination with certain gentlemen who control the great credits of the country.

Now I am not hot in my mind against these gentlemen. They used the opportunities which we accorded them, and they have got us. Some of them are just as patriotic, just as public spirited, just as honest as any man in America. But when you have got the market in your hand, does honesty oblige you to turn the palm upside down and empty it? If you have got the market in your hand and believe that you understand the interest of the country better than anybody else, is it patriotic to let it go?

I was trying to analyze the other day what a Republican is. [Laughter.] I do not want to say anything about that great body of my fellow countrymen in various parts of America who have formed the bad habit of voting the Republican ticket. They are not the men I am talking about, but the Republican leaders, the men who establish the ideals and policies of that party, how would you describe them? Why, I would say that they are men who actually believe that the only men whose advice it is safe to take with regard to the happiness and prosperity of America are the men who have the biggest material stake in the enterprises of America. They believe, therefore, that America ought to be governed by trustees [applause], and that those trustees are the managers of the oldest and greatest "vested interests" of the country. That is a workable theory, that is a theory that has obtained time out of mind. It happens, though these gentlemen have forgotten it, that America was established to get rid of it, but, having forgotten that, reading only the older books, I dare say, reading back of the birth of America, they say that there are only a few men with grasp enough of affairs and knowledge enough of what are the bases of prosperity to run a big, complicated Government like this.

Now, as a Democrat [applause], I define myself by absolutely protesting against that view of public affairs. I will not live under trustees if I can help it. [Applause.] No group of men less than the majority has a right to tell me how I have got to live in America. I will submit to the majority, because I have been trained to do it, though I may have my private opinion even of the majority; but, being a dyed-in-the-wool Democrat, I am proud to submit my judgment to that majority of my fellow citizens.

I know that there are some gum-shoe politicians in both camps who do not agree with that theory at all. They say, "You need not say much about it out loud, but we have got to run these people; this enterprise of free government has to be personally conducted [applause]; that the people want this or that we do not deny, but they do not know what is good for them."

So there are two theories of trusteeship, a trusteeship of the big interests and a trusteeship of the machine. I do not see my way to subscribe to either kind of trusteeship. Not that I am an insurgent, because I believe in organization; I believe that party success is impossible without organization; but I make this distinction between organization and the machine—organization is a systematic cooperation of men for a common purpose, while the machine is a systematic cooperation of men for a private purpose. [Great applause.] I know what I am talking about, because we have a perfect specimen in New Jersey.

Now I know what supports the machine, because I have seen them eat out of a spoon. It is a golden spoon, and I have seen the nurse that fed them, and I have seen that nurse absolutely impartial as between the Republican machine and the Democratic machine [laughter and applause], and the price of the food, the price of the nutrition, is that the machine will be good; that it will see that nothing is done that will hurt the nurse; that nothing is done which will interfere with the private understanding that is established in the nursery.

Now, this is our problem. We have got to set to work now systematically to conserve every resource and every energy of America. We have got to realize that an absolute readjustment of trade is necessary, and that that is an irresistible battering-ram that is battering at the wall of the tariff.

The tariff is not the question it was a generation ago. I hear gentlemen make speeches now who do not know that, but it is not. They talk as if it was a question of protecting us from external competition, while internal competition keeps prices down; and I happen to know that there is not any internal competition. [Applause.] And I happen to know that this great, irresistible energy of America is doing more than it can keep within its own shops and limits, and therefore it has got to be released for the commercial conquest of the world. Say what you will, whether you are abstractly for protection or against it, you have got to legislate for the release of the energies of America.

Then, in the next place, there is the whole matter of business adjustment. Our laws are just about a generation belated, as compared with economic conditions not only, but as compared with what other advanced nations have done to bring about adjustment. Progressive America is belated, has lost its leadership in the handsome competition to show the world the way out of its difficulties.

That is the problem, and that is the reason I say that the twentieth century is better worth living in than any century that has turned up in our recollection, and that is the reason I return with confidence to Virginia and say: "You remember that your men saw such an age when this Government was set up; is she daunted now to see another age that calls for constructive statesmanship; has she less vision now; has she lost courage now; has she lost the indomitable integrity now that she had then?" I wonder what will happen when Virginia sees these things with the veil withdrawn from her eyes. She will rejoice as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber; she will say, "Here is an age fit for Virginia again."

Now, what are we going to do about it?

A VOICE. Elect Wilson. [Applause.]

Mr. WILSON. I hoped that you would not hear that. What is our problem? First of all, in order to move carefully, we have got to move by standard, have we not? You can not launch out and trust to the currents. You have got to have something to steer by. You have got to know whither you are bound.

You know that curious expression, that very erroneous expression we have, when a man has lost his way in a forest or a desert. We say he has lost himself. Did you ever reflect that that is the only thing he has not lost. He is there, but what is lost is all the rest of the world. If he knew any fixed thing in his neighborhood and knew whether it was east of him, or north of him, or south of him, or west of him, he could steer; but he has lost even the points of the compass. He does not know how he is related to the universe. Now, unless you have a standard to steer by, you are lost; how would you know in which direction to steer, and where you are going? If I want to go in that direction this way is not my road. I have got to know whither I am bound and what landmarks to guide myself by.

Do we lack landmarks in America after all those ancient principles which we have set up like secret temples in which to go and worship and compose our spirits?

In the first place, we have the standards of liberty and equal opportunity. In the second place, we have this standard that the people are entitled to a government which represents them. [Applause.] And in the third place, they are entitled to government by that government which is in the common interest and not in the interest of special privilege.

Are not these the temples of liberty in which we have worshiped? Will any man be charged justly with trying to upset the institutions of America who works in the spirit of the worship of those principles?

What is liberty? You say of a great locomotive engine that it runs free. What do you mean? You mean that its parts are so assembled and adjusted that friction is reduced to a minimum, and that it has perfect adjustment. What do you mean by saying that a boat sails free? Do you mean that she is independent of the great breath that is in the heavens? Do you not mean that she has accommodated herself with graceful obeisance with the winds? Throw her up in the wind and see her shiver in every stick and stitch of her, while, as a seaman would say, she is held in irons. But let her fall off, let her bow to the majesty of nature, and then she is free in her adjustment. Let these serve as images.

Human freedom consists in perfect adjustment of human interests to one another. The whole problem is a problem of adjustment, reducing the friction; not reducing it by mere lubrication [applause]; not reducing it by merely pouring in the oil of money and persuasion and flattery; but by so adjusting the parts that they love to cooperate, that they never buckle up, that they never grow so hot that we can not move the machine at all without danger. And unless there is this perfect adjustment there will not be given that opportunity without which men can not draw a full breath or live a day without despair. Let any group of men have the right to say to others, "You must come to us before you can do anything," and see how long America will be considered a place worth living in by free men.

Our standards, therefore, are these, and we must fearlessly use them—we must say to ourselves, "We are going to reject everything that does not square with those things."

Now, what is the fact? I am happy to believe that Virginia has so far been spared the mortifying experience that has come upon some other States. A great many of the States of this Union, ladies and gentlemen, have been privately controlled. There has not been an adjustment, there has not been free opportunity, there has not been government that represented the people, there has not been government in the common interests. When changes are proposed in those Commonwealths, do not fall upon those who propose them and say they are changing the character of our Government; or, if you do, admit they are changing it back from what it has become to what it was originally intended to be. [Applause.] No man that I know of and trust; no man that I will consent to consort with, is trying to change anything fundamental in America. But what means have we of change? Suppose that every time you try to change your government, you have the experience that the enterprising people of New Jersey had for 16 years together, when to choose between one ticket and another ticket was to choose between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee. Suppose that every time public opinion unmistakably expressed itself, something invisible, something intangible, something that you could not get at, intervened between you and the action upon which you had determined, then what image would arise in your mind? That you are disappointed in your institutions as they were established? No. That you are mortified because of the change that has come over your institutions by the extent to which they have been debased.

Now, you have got to choose between one of two things. I never saw this as I see it now until I came into actual, practical contact with the administration of a great State. I thank God that I have learned something in the last 18 months, and what I have learned is this: That you have got to choose between two courses, either constructive leadership which you will stand behind to the limit, or else a resort direct to the people themselves. There are no other ways.

What does it mean, ladies and gentlemen, that all over the United States people are demanding of their governors and of their President that they take the affairs of those people in their own hands, demanding of them leadership, not satisfied that they are honest, merely; not satisfied with their good intentions, merely, but demanding of them that they shall translate their intentions into such persuasive government that nothing can withstand them as spokesmen of the people? That is what America is demanding.

I want to tell a story, if you will allow me—I have told it very often, but most of you probably have not heard it. While Mr. Roosevelt was President I boarded a train near my home one day and I found one of the gentlemen who were then Senators from New Jersey on the train. I dropped into the seat beside him. I found him in a very bad humor. I said, "Senator, what is the matter?" "Oh," he said, "I wish the Constitution had not given the President the right to send messages to Congress." "Why," I said, "Senator, you are barking up the wrong tree. That is not what is the matter. The trouble is that the President publishes his messages, and if the country happens to agree with him it does not stop to hear what you have to say." The President is the only member of the Government of the United States elected by the whole people of the United States; he is the only one whose utterances go into all the newspapers of the United States; and, inasmuch as he has a universal audience and nobody else has, nobody can answer him; and if he happens to speak the opinion of the country nobody can resist him. [Applause.] America has got the zest for that in its imagination, and it is unquiet if it does not get a President that will do that sort of thing; and I will tell you, having ridden a restive State myself, that the people in most of the States are very uncomfortable and full of protest if their governors do not do it. They do not want their governors to exercise any unconstitutional power; but what is a more constitutional power than the power of public opinion? What is more persuasive and irresistible than the voice of universal conviction? That is the force that can bring back representative government in America where it has been lost. Thank God there are a great many places where it has not been lost. It is a local question; it is a question which each community can settle for itself.

But if you can not get constructive leadership, then what? If every time you try it, somebody defeats the purpose which your leader expresses, what are you going to do about it?

I want to read you a passage from the Virginia Bill of Rights, that immortal document which has been a model for declarations of liberty throughout the rest of the continent:

"That all power is vested in and consequently derived from the people; that magistrates are their trustees and servants, and at all times amenable to them."

Did you ever hear the doctrine put more flatly?

"That government is, or ought to be, instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security of the people of the Nation or community; of all the various modes and forms of government that is the best which is capable of producing the greatest degree of happiness and safety and is the most effectually secured against the danger of maladministration; and, when any government shall be found inadequate or contrary to these purposes a majority of the community hath an indubitable, inalienable, and indefeasible right to reform, alter, or abolish it in such manner as shall be judged most conducive to the public weal."

I have heard that read a score of times on the 4th of July, but I never heard it read where actual measures were being debated. [Applause.] Now, I am willing to come back to Virginia and stand with George Mason on the Bill of Rights. When I do that I have got native soil under my feet, soil more fertile for the growth of liberty than any soil that can be compounded. [Applause.] And I say that if we can not get constructive leadership—and we can if we will—then we have our solution in the Bill of Rights, "A majority of the community hath an indubitable, inalienable, and indefeasible right to reform, alter, or abolish it as may be judged most conducive to the public weal." I do not propose anything of that sort—I do not believe it is necessary—but I do like a gun behind the door. [Applause.] I do like to say to people, "Well, if you can't bring the game down any other way, go and get your gun."

There are wise and unwise ways of shooting. I had rather pepper the animal than kill him; I had rather touch him once than deprive him of vitality. But you can load your gun according to your own taste; you do not have to put buckshot in it, you can put the smallest birdshot in it that you can find, and then at your leisure afterwards pick it out of the hide. But always remember that behind you like a bulwark is that bill of rights that you have the right to any kind of government you please to have. That is the kind of insurgent I am, because all the while I remember the temper of America. I honestly believe that a better Nation, more long enduring, more patiently suffering, more conservative people does not exist upon God's planet. I am not afraid of the American people getting up and humping themselves; I am only afraid they will not; and when I hear of popular vote spoken of as mob government, I feel like telling the man who utters that that he has no right to call himself an American. [Applause.] Just picture to yourselves, ladies and gentlemen, the great voting population of Virginia, from the sea to the far borders in the mountains, going calmly, man by man, to the polls, expressing their judgment about public affairs, and ask yourselves if that is your image of a mob.

What is a mob? A mob is a body of men in hot contact with one another, moved by a single, ungovernable passion upon doing a hasty thing that they will regret the next day. Do you see anything resembling a mob in that voting population of the countryside, men tramping over the mountainside, men going to the general store up in the village, men going in little conversing groups to cast their ballots—is that your notion of a mob, or is that your picture of free, self-governing people?

I am not afraid of the judgments so expressed if you give men time to think, if you give them a clear conception of the things they are to vote for; because the deepest conviction and passion of my heart is that the common people, by which I mean all of us, are to be absolutely trusted. [Applause.] The peculiarity of some representatives, particularly of the Republican Party, is that when they talk about the people they obviously do not include themselves. Now if, when you think of the people, you are not thinking about yourself, then you do not belong in America. I, on the other hand, am liberal and generous enough, when I speak of the people, to include them. [Applause.] They do not deserve it, but then I can not, if I am true to my principles, exclude them; they have got to come in. You know that delightful expression Horace Greeley, who was one of the general advocates of a general amnesty to the southern people, made use of in an eager argument one day. He said, "You know we have got to forgive them, damn them." [Laughter and applause.] That is the only working program. You can not have the people unless you include everybody, and therefore I am ready to admit everybody.

When I look back at the processes of history, when I look back at the genesis of America, I see this written over every page, that the nations are renewed from the bottom, not from the top; that the genius which springs up from the ranks of unknown men is the genius which renews the youth and energy of the people; and in every age of the world, where you stop the courses of the blood from the roots, you injure the great, useful structure to the extent that atrophy, death, and decay are sure to ensue. That is the reason that an hereditary monarchy does not work; that is the reason that an hereditary aristocracy does not work; that is the reason that everything of that sort is full of corruption and ready to decay.

So I say that our challenge of to-day is to include in the partnership all those great bodies of unnamed men who are going to produce our future leaders and renew the future energies of America. And as I confess that, as I confess my belief in the common man, I know what I am saying. The man who is swimming against the stream knows the strength of it. The man who is in the mêlée knows what blows are being struck and what blood is being drawn. The man who is on the make is a judge of what is happening in America, not the man who has made; not the man who has emerged from the flood, not the man who is standing on the bank looking on, but the man who is struggling for his life and for the lives of those who are dearer to him than himself. That is the man whose judgment will tell you what is going on in America, and that is the man by whose judgment I for one wish to be guided [applause], so that as the tasks multiply and the days come when all will seem confusion and dismay we may lift up our eyes to the hills out of these dark valleys where the crags of special privilege overshadow and darken our path, to where the sun gleams through the great passage in the broken cliffs, the sun of God, the sun meant to regenerate men, the sun meant to liberate them from their passion and despair, and to lift us to those uplands which are the promised land of every man who desires liberty and achievement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be set apart and reserved for school, park, and other public purposes not more than 5 acres of the lands not heretofore disposed of, within each of the town sites of Timber Lake and Dupree, in that portion of the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian Reservations in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, authorized to be disposed of under the act of May 29, 1908. Patents shall be issued for the lands so set apart and reserved for school, park, or other public purposes to the said municipalities of Timber Lake and Dupree: Provided, That the purchase price of all town lots hereafter sold under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior in the said town sites of Timber Lake and Dupree shall be paid at such times and in such installments and upon such terms as he may direct, and he shall cause 20 per cent of the net proceeds arising from such sales to be set apart and expended under his direction in the construction of schoolhouses or other public buildings or improvements in the respective town sites in which lots are sold.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] whether the existing law provides that the purchase price of town sites shall be paid at such times and in such installments and upon such terms as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, or whether this is a change of the law with reference to that?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In the recent bills that have been passed, my recollection is that we have provided that the sales shall be subject to terms that the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, on the theory that the lots sell more advantageously if sold on time rather than for cash.

Mr. MANN. Did the original act in this case provide for cash sales?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The original act in regard to the selling of town sites, as I recall it, provided for cash sales, but I am not certain about it. It was passed in the Sixtieth Congress and I was not a Member at that time. Mr. Chairman, in view of what has been said, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 11, after the word "in," strike out the words "the construction of schoolhouses" and insert in lieu thereof the words "payment of schoolhouses that may have been or may hereafter be constructed."

Mr. MANN. Is it the intention of the gentleman to have this 20 per cent used in payment for existing schoolhouses?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. When I introduced the bill I did not take into consideration the fact that the schoolhouses were already constructed. I only offer the amendment at the suggestion of some of the gentlemen who have participated in the debate, who suggested that it might be well to provide that it could be so used in case the schoolhouses have not been paid for. I am not going to insist upon it. Personally I am satisfied with the language of the bill as introduced.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman's judgment tell him that we would be justified in devoting the 20 per cent to such a purpose?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman frankly that I have not given it any consideration, and perhaps it would be better to withdraw the amendment. I do not care particularly about it myself. I think I will withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. KENDALL. I want to ask the gentleman from South Dakota if he has given consideration to the suggestion advanced by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] as to the propriety of transferring this fund to the local municipality?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that I have given that considerable thought, and have concluded that unless it was left under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior it is very doubtful if we could secure the legislation at all, because possibly the money might be used for purposes not contemplated by Congress.

Mr. KENDALL. There would be no difficulty in securing the passage of the bill.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There might be difficulty, because bills do not always become laws that pass both Houses of Congress.

Mr. KENDALL. Is there not a substantial depletion of the fund under the system the gentleman proposes, in the way of expenses incurred by the Department of the Interior?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The theory is that this money being taken from the proceeds of the sales of the lots, and the proceeds going indirectly to the Indians, that the Secretary of the Interior ought to supervise that portion of it, as he is the representative of the Indians.

Mr. KENDALL. This experiment has been tested in Oklahoma, as I understand it, and I want to inquire of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] what per cent of the funds derived from the sale of these lands was absorbed in the expenses of the Interior Department?

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will yield to me, I will gladly give him what information I have on the subject. We have had some practical experience with this, and I think it is the best of judgment to let the Secretary of the Interior do it. That does not allow half a dozen divergent interests to pull and haul over the fund, to say in what part of the town it shall be expended, and so forth. The Secretary of the Interior sent a man down there who modestly and unassumingly did a good job of it. The legislation referred to caused lots to bring fully half more than they otherwise would have brought. The auctioneer would say, "So much for the Indians and so much for the Lawton." It helped secure a larger sum for the Indians and left the town with two good schoolhouses. I think it would be very unwise to turn this over to the local community. The department has men who are competent men who will go down there and work in conjunction with the Commercial Club and the city council and do what is right. I do not think there is any objection that will ever come from that method.

Mr. KENDALL. The gentleman from Oklahoma has talked very entertainingly, as he always does, but he has not given us any information as to the per cent of the money that was absorbed by the Interior Department in administration.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not have it in dollars and cents, but it must have been a very small amount. They had but one man who came there and who only remained during the construction. I do not think he fooled away a moment's time, and he went away immediately after the job was completed. I do not think any criticism could be raked up on that question. He left us two nice school buildings, erected at a reasonable price, and there has been no scandal or criticism resulting from it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There is no amendment pending, Mr. Chairman, and unless somebody offers one I shall move that the committee rise.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am somewhat amazed, Mr. Chairman, at the lack of confidence in the people exhibited by the gentlemen around me.

Mr. MANN. On which side?

Mr. MONDELL. On both sides. Gentlemen seem to think that some one in the Interior Department is more capable of building schoolhouses and bridges and repairing streets in American municipalities than are the people who live in the municipalities. We have heard a great deal of late of "government by the people," and now we have a concrete proposition whether we shall allow the people to govern themselves and to make their own expenditures for schoolhouses, and improvements of roads, and the building of bridges, in their own towns, or whether it shall be left to a bureau here in Washington.

I have no doubt but that the bureau will do the best it can, and I have no doubt but what the operation of the bureau in the Lawton case, referred to, was entirely satisfactory. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this is a very different case from the case of the Lawton lots. There there was an auction of a large number of lots and a considerable sum of money was secured, which was all to be expended in new buildings. It is entirely possible that it was best to have it expended by the Secretary of the Interior, although, as far as I am concerned, I am one of those who believe that the good people of Lawton could have spent it just as well as, and probably a little better than, any agent of the Federal Government. I trust the people.

Mr. MANN. But do they trust the gentleman from Wyoming? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Some of them must, or I would not be here. I think we can trust the people of these municipalities to expend the small amount they may receive from the sale of the town lots.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I can not; I have but little time. Here are small country towns in which, from time to time in the future, lots will be sold and a few hundred dollars will be realized from the sale of those lots. Twenty per cent of that will be reserved, which may amount to $150 or $250, or in the course of years $500, but according to some gentlemen the people are not competent to expend that princely sum of money, and so we must have an employee of a Federal bureau go out there and tell them where they want their schoolhouses and where they want other public buildings, what roads shall be graded, and what bridges should be built. The employee will, of course, remain during the expenditure of the money, and thus a considerable portion of it will be absorbed in the expense of administration.

The gentleman from Oklahoma thinks that the Interior Department did not absorb a considerable amount of the Lawton fund in administration. Perhaps not, but I think if the gentleman will refresh his memory he will recall that there were cases in Oklahoma where a considerable portion of the sums received was absorbed in administration. The traveling expenses of a representative of the department going from here to South Dakota and back, his necessary residence there for a number of weeks or months while these improvements are going on, will absorb a considerable portion of any returns from the sale of the town lots. It does seem to me that when we are giving these people a small portion of the receipts from the sale of the town lots in their town, as it is proper that we should do, we may very properly turn these sums over to them and allow them to use them as they use their other municipal funds. The gentleman from Minnesota may not trust the people of these small towns in the expenditure of their own money, but I do. I think that the history of small American municipalities at least justify us in trusting the people to expend their own money.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do poss.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MORRISON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 45, affecting the town sites of Timber Lake and Dupree, in South Dakota, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 22339) to regulate the method of directing the work of Government employees, and the same was referred to the Committee on Labor.

WINNEBAGO INDIANS.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 18849) for the relief of the Winnebago Indians of Nebraska and Wisconsin, and ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas calls up a bill and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think we better go into the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 18849, with Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi in the chair.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been introduced and reported by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEPHENS], and I yield the floor to him for an explanation of the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, this bill simply completes the act that was passed by Congress in 1909 for the capitalization of the Winnebago fund. There are two branches of these Indians—one in Wisconsin and one in Nebraska. From 1864 to 1875 the Interior Department made a mistake in the distribution of the annuities belonging to these two branches of this tribe of Indians. The department paid to the Nebraska Indians the entire annuity. As the result of this error—it was discovered in 1875, I think—it was necessary for the department to withhold each year the sum of $7,000 out of the annuities due the Winnebago Indians of Nebraska until their debt to the Wisconsin branch was canceled. This was done for a period of years, until the debt was reduced to something like $41,000. The department now finds itself unable to adjust this indebtedness without further legislation. The department recommended the passage of this bill, and the committee has reported it out. Since the committee reported the bill we have had a communication from the department suggesting an amendment, which I shall offer later. There is nothing to this bill, as I understand it, except giving the Interior Department authority to adjudicate the differences between these two branches of the Winnebago Tribe of Indians. If there are no questions in regard to the matter, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The bill provides that after ascertaining the fund the Secretary of the Interior may expend said fund—for their benefit, in such manner, including the purchase of lands for said Indians, as he may deem proper, or, in his discretion, to distribute said fund, or any part thereof, per capita among said Indians.

Do we give as broad an authority as that to the Secretary of the Interior in respect to any other Indian fund?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I think so. I think that all similar Indian funds are distributed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. Especially where the competency of the Indians is questioned.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may be correct, but that language struck me when I read it as being new—authorizing the Secretary to expend a fund for the benefit of the Indians in such manner as he pleases, absolutely, without any restriction upon his authority, to pay them a part of the money or to pay them all of the money or to buy land for them or to expend it in any way he sees fit. I think it is unusual to give such broad authority to the Secretary in reference to Indian funds.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the Interior Department has in charge the expenditure of the annuities of all the Indians that I know anything about, and he expends those annuities according to his discretion; and the Indians in my own State, the Winnebagoes, referred to in this bill, and the Omaha Indians, are classified by the department. A competency commission was appointed, and those Indians are classed in three departments—the incompetents, those who are subject to the supervision of the department, and those who are allowed to expend their funds in the manner they may see fit. Those are the Indians who have been allotted their lands and have title in fee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman may be correct in the main, but unless my recollection is at fault, which it frequently is, I regard the authority granted here broader than is customary. In appropriation bills we necessarily give a great deal of discretion to the Secretary of the Interior.

It seems to me it is not necessary to generally provide that the Secretary, when he ascertains the funds due to a tribe—and of course that would apply to any funds in the hands of the Treasury in any other case—can expend it as he pleases, purchase land with it, pay them all or a part of it. There seems to be no limitation whatever upon the Secretary of the Interior. If that is the usual language, I have not a word to say about it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. That is absolutely the usual thing.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken about that. I am very confident in respect to that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I do not know what authority I could give other than the statute itself.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I will say that it is customary where we make appropriations, for instance, from tribal funds, as we have in several instances in relation to the Kiowa and the Comanche funds—and I think the last appropriation was $400,000—to place it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. So far as these Indians are concerned, the purpose and intent of the bill leaving it entirely with the Secretary is that this fund will be segregated. Many of these Indians are competent and capable of taking care of what they have, and under the terms of the law the Secretary of the Interior may, if he desires, let them withdraw their portion of the fund, and that which remains will be used for the particular Indian to whom it is credited. In other words, it will be credited equally on a per capita basis.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman thinks that this is a special case?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I consider this a special case, and had I not so considered it would have suggested an amendment. In fact, the matter was discussed in committee, and the view was expressed that it was a considerable sum to give the Secretary discretion to handle, and that perhaps we ought to limit it and provide that he should have one-half of it or one-quarter of it; but I think it would only mean that later we would have to enact this legislation.

And I say further that where the Secretary has had this authority I do not think it has been abused, and I will call the gentleman's attention to a law which passed in 1906, which, in effect, provided that the Secretary of the Interior has authority to remove restrictions from the allotted lands and grant a fee patent, and it was thought that if he could be trusted with that power he certainly can be trusted with the distribution of a fund that does not exceed more than the amount that is involved in this matter—that is, about $800,000.

Mr. MANN. Nearly $1,000,000 is involved here.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. About $800,000.

Mr. MANN. About $1,000,000, I repeat. A little thing like $100,000——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I call the gentleman's attention again to the fact that a portion of this money—I do not know the per cent, but the gentleman from Nebraska can probably give the information—will be paid out immediately to these Indians who are entirely competent to take care of themselves. The gentleman from Wisconsin can probably give the information relative to the Indians in his State that will receive a part of the money.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state, in this connection, that Congress in 1909 capitalized these Winnebago funds so far as the Nebraska branch was concerned, but that law had a reservation in it to the effect that no allotment of tribal funds should be made to the Wisconsin branch of the tribe until further legislation. This bill is that further legislation. The Nebraska branch is, as a whole, much more prosperous—possibly more intelligent and capable of handling its trust funds—than are the members of the Wisconsin branch. They are rather improvident, and many of them have no homestead. Originally they were allotted upon lands which were so poor that they could not make a livelihood. The purpose of giving the Secretary of the Interior discretion to purchase land I think is very largely with a view to aiding members of the Wisconsin branch, not of the Nebraska branch, the idea being that many of the Wisconsin members of the tribe would not be capable of handling the funds they would receive if those were capitalized; but if the money they were to receive was put into lands they would be given the means of livelihood. I have had many of these members of the Wisconsin branch come to me and state that they desired to use their funds in the purchase of land. This bill would enable them to do that and would make them self-sustaining, and on that account, while the discretion granted here is large, I think it would result beneficially to these Wisconsin members of the tribe. The other powers granted to the Secretary in this bill are no greater than those in the act of 1906, if I remember correctly, which gives the Secretary of the Interior discretion in the payment and distribution of trust funds.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill now be read under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, when the amount of tribal funds due the Winnebagoes in Wisconsin shall have been ascertained, in accordance with the enrollment made by him under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1909 (35 Stat. L., 798), to expend said funds for their benefit in such manner, including the purchase of lands for said Indians, as he may deem proper, or, in his discretion, to distribute said funds, or any part thereof, per capita among said Indians: Provided, That in adjusting the present indebtedness of the Nebraska branch of the tribe to the Winnebago branch of Wisconsin the Secretary is hereby authorized to deduct from the share of the trust funds of the Nebraska Winnebagoes such amount as may be found due the said Wisconsin branch and to transfer the amount so deducted to the credit of the Winnebagoes belonging to the Wisconsin branch of the tribe.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, when the amount of tribal funds due the Winnebagoes in Wisconsin shall have been ascertained, in accordance with the enrollment as hereinafter provided, to expend said funds for their benefit in such manner, including the purchase of lands for said Indians, as he may deem proper, or, in his discretion, to distribute said funds, or any part thereof, per capita among said Indians: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to adjust the differences, not already provided for by statute, between the two branches of the tribe arising from errors in the payment of annuities, and to settle the same before the final division of the trust funds is made: Provided further, That a special census of the two branches of the Winnebago Tribe shall be taken as of June 30, 1912, and that the final division of the capitalized funds of the tribe shall be based upon the number of persons belonging to each branch who are alive on that date."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendment favorably.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18849, to which one amendment had been made, and had directed him to report the bill as amended to the House with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, his motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DIVISION OF LANDS AND FUNDS OF OSAGE NATION OF INDIANS IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up Union Calendar No. 61, Senate bill No. 2.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2) supplementary to and amendatory of the act entitled "An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Nation of Indians in Oklahoma," approved June 28, 1906, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEPHENS] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill No. 2, with Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill No. 2, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2) supplementary to and amendatory of the act entitled "An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Nation of Indians in Oklahoma," approved June 28, 1906, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object—which I do not intend to do—will the gentleman then move that the committee do rise? There are hardly enough Members here.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration Senate bill No. 2, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 28, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

THE WATERS OF NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. BURTON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. THEODORE E. BURTON,
ELIHU ROOT,
A. O. BACON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

WM. SULZER,
HENRY D. FLOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I desire briefly to explain this conference report.

It provides for the extension of a statute passed in 1906 relating to Niagara Falls. This statute has been twice extended, and now for the third time it is proposed to continue its life until the expiration of the present Congress, March 4, 1913.

The original act asserted the jurisdiction of the United States over Niagara River and contained provisions relating to its navigable quality, its integrity as a boundary stream, and the scenic beauty of Niagara Falls. The original act permitted the diversion of 15,600 cubic feet per second on the American side, or side of the United States, and as the diversion of water in Canada afforded a serious threat of interference with the stream and the beauty of the Falls, the quantity of electrical power which could be imported from Canada was limited to 160,000 horsepower.

There is a general impression that a large amount of power would be imported from Canada except for this act. Such is not the case. As already stated, the quantity allowed to be brought into the United States from Canada is 160,000 horsepower. The present amount brought in is divided between four companies—the Ontario Power Co., approximately 60,000 horsepower; the Canadian Niagara Power Co., 52,500 horsepower; the Electrical Development Co. of Ontario, 12,500; and the International Railway, 1,500, making in all 116,500 horsepower. So there is a further amount of 43,500 horsepower which could be imported into the United States under this act which is continued.

I say this, Mr. President, to meet a prevalent objection that divers communities and enterprises are precluded from the use of electrical energy and that the present act in some way aids monopoly. It does nothing of the kind, because there is still a margin of over 40,000 horsepower which can be admitted under the present act.

There is one other subject to be considered in this connection. The total quantity which could be imported under franchises granted in Canada, which provide that only half that which is generated can be sent out of that country, would not exceed 200,000 horsepower, and as the installations are not complete the time is not yet reached when that quantity could be brought into the United States.

Mr. President, I think it very desirable that there should be further legislation upon this subject defining the rights of the United States, protecting the Falls, and determining just the quantity of water which can be diverted on this side; also the amount of power which can be transmitted from Canada.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives is now considering this question and has held extensive hearings. Of course, if any act is passed it would supersede this resolution or the bill the object of which is to maintain the status quo which it extends. In this connection I desire——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I inquire of the Senator from Ohio if the purpose of the present resolution or bill is not merely to extend the operation of the joint resolution for some time in the future?

Mr. BURTON. That is it, and maintain the status quo.

Mr. CULBERSON. It does not go into the matters the Senator is discussing now.

Mr. BURTON. It does not. I am referring to questions which I think should be settled by permanent legislation.

Mr. CULBERSON. Not intended to be settled, however, by the present resolution.

Mr. BURTON. Not by the present resolution.

Under a treaty framed in the year 1909 and ratified in 1910, the maximum amount of water which can be diverted from Niagara River in Canada is 36,000 cubic feet per second. That limit is probably reached by franchises already granted, although the installations are by no means complete, and that quantity is not as yet diverted. The maximum amount which can be diverted in the United States is 20,000, and the total quantity at present in use is 15,600, leaving a margin of 4,400 cubic feet.

I sincerely hope, Mr. President, that no legislation will be adopted under which that margin, the remaining quantity, may be diverted, for I believe that the people of the United States desire that this, one of the greatest wonders of the world, shall be preserved in all its grandeur and beauty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Can the Senator inform the Senate whether any estimate has been made as to how much the crest of the Falls, so called, would be lowered in case the extra 4,400 cubic feet were diverted?

Mr. BURTON. Of course it is difficult to make any estimate of the effect of an additional amount. There is an estimate by the engineers that on the Canadian side the water near to the shore has been lowered 5⅛ inches. Just exactly what effect would be created by the diversion of an additional 4,400 cubic feet can not be very accurately measured.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The reason why I asked the question was that it had come to me, not in an official way but by hearsay, that some one of the Government engineers had estimated that the diversion of the additional 4,400 cubic feet provided for by the treaty would only lower the height of the water as it comes over the falls about one-tenth of an inch, if I recall the figure.

Mr. BURTON. It may be that some such estimate was made.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will not be certain as to the figure.

Mr. BURTON. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut we must take into account not merely the lowering of the crest of the Falls, but the volume. Both are essential parts of the beauty and the grandeur of the cataract.

The total average flow over the Falls, I will say in further answer to the Senator from Connecticut, is or was about 220,000 cubic feet per second. The quantity authorized to be diverted by the two countries under the treaty is 36,000+20,000—56,000 cubic feet. I think it stands to reason that so considerable a quantity as this can not be diverted without in a material degree interfering with the volume of water and consequent injury to the grandeur of the Falls. It would be about 25 per cent, or a quarter, of the total flow.

It has been frequently asserted that there is no interest in Canada in the preservation of the Falls. Mr. President, I can not believe that that is the case, and I am satisfied that when the question is once raised there and depletion of the Falls becomes imminent, our neighbors across the border will be quite as much interested as we are ourselves. Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

PUBLIC-LAND ENTRIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3367) to amend section 2291 and section 2297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to homesteads, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 2291 and section 2297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2291. No certificate, however, shall be given or patent issued therefor until the expiration of three years from the date of such entry; and if at the expiration of such time, or at any time within two years thereafter, the person making such entry, or if he be dead his widow, or in case of her death his heirs or devisee, or in case of a widow making such entry her heirs or devisee, in case of her death, proves by himself and by two credible witnesses that he, she, or they have a habitable house upon the land and have actually resided upon and cultivated the same for the term of three years succeeding the time of filing the affidavit, and makes affidavit that no part of such land has been alienated, except as provided in section 2288, and that he, she, or they will bear true allegiance to the Government of the United States, then in such case he, she, or they, if at any time citizens of the United States, shall be entitled to a patent, as in other cases provided by law: Provided, That the entryman may be absent from the land for not more than five months in each period of one year after establishing residence, but in case of commutation the 14 months' actual residence as now required by law must be shown: Provided, That when the person making entry dies before the offer of final proof those succeeding to the entry must show that the entryman had complied with the law in all respects to the date of his death and that they have since complied with the law in all respects, as would have been required of the entryman had he lived, excepting that they are relieved from any requirement of residence upon the land.

"SEC. 2297. If, at any time after the filing of the affidavit as required in section 2290 and before the expiration of the three years mentioned in section 2291, it is proved, after due notice to the settler, to the satisfaction of the register of the land office that the person having filed such affidavit has failed to establish residence within six months after the date of entry, or abandoned the land for more than six months at any time, then and in that event the land so entered shall revert to the Government: Provided, That the three years' period of residence herein fixed shall date from the time of establishing actual permanent residence upon the land: And provided further, That where there may be climatic reasons, sickness, or other unavoidable cause, the Commissioner of the General Land Office may, in his discretion, allow the settler 12 months from the date of filing in which to commence his residence on said land under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe."

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendments of the House of Representatives, agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Pending that, I ask that the substitute be printed. The proposed law is entirely new, and many of us who are personally interested in this matter would like to have an opportunity to read it carefully.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Idaho desires that the matter be printed and go over until to-morrow. Without objection——

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Idaho ask that it go over until to-morrow, or does he merely ask that it be printed?

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not include that, unless under the rule it must lie over. I did not ask that it go over. I merely desire, while the conference is considering the proposition, that we may have it in convenient form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order will be entered for the printing. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. JONES, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN conferees on the part of the Senate.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., March 26, 1912.

Hon. GEORGE PERKINS and Hon. J. D. WORKS,
Senators from California, Washington, D. C.:

The citizens of the city of Sacramento, in mass meeting assembled, respectfully represent as follows: That there is now produced annually in the United States 600,000 tons of beet sugar; that California produced in 1911, 162,000 tons of beet sugar. Ten factories are now engaged in the manufacture of beet sugar in California; that in this production in California approximately 108,000 acres of land are used annually, producing 1,100,000 tons of raw beets, and distributed to the farmers engaged in the culture of sugar beets approximately $6,000,000 annually; that the bill now pending before the Senate of the United States providing for the free entry of raw sugar into the United States will result disastrously to the beet-sugar industry in the United States; that from the foregoing statement of facts it is apparent that California will suffer in that behalf in a greater degree than any other State in the Union. We therefore earnestly request you to use your influence and every legitimate means in your power to prevent the passage of the said bill.

Respectfully,

L. C. DRESCHER,
Chairman of Citizens' Meeting.

POTASH AND NITRATES IN PUBLIC LANDS (H. DOC. NO. 644).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Among the most acute of the problems faced by our agricultural interests is that of the maintenance of soil fertility, and among the elements of greatest value in maintaining this fertility is the element potassium in its various combinations. In an address delivered at St. Paul, Minn., on September 5, 1910, in discussing the withdrawals of phosphate lands, I stated that "phosphorus is one of the three essentials to plant growth, the other elements being nitrogen and potash."

The scientific bureaus of the Government have discovered and classified large areas of public lands underlain by phosphate rock and the withdrawal act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat., 847), confers upon the Executive ample authority for the protection of these lands until an adequate law for their disposal shall have been enacted. In both of these respects the situation as to potash and nitrogen differs from that as to phosphorus. Until very recently no important deposits of potash salts have been known in the United States, and no law exists to enable the Executive to adequately control the development of such deposits as they may become known.

Recent discoveries by Government scientists in the deserts of the Southwest indicate that in at least one locality potassium salts exist in important commercial quantities in the form of a natural brine. Further explorations are to be initiated at once, and it is hoped that they will result in the discovery of additional deposits whose utilization will inure to the great benefit of the agricultural industry of the United States and may reduce the necessity for continuing the present extensive importations. In the face of this discovery I am confronted by the fact that the laws at present upon our statute books for the disposal of minerals of this type existing upon public lands are inadequate for the protection of the public interests and that there exists no authority for withholding them from disposal until the Congress shall enact an appropriate law.

The greater part of the lands upon which the discoveries now known exist (and it is to be noted that these were made by the use of specific appropriations made by Congress for the purpose) are as yet in public ownership, but may be acquired at any time under the placer-mining law by private interests which will have contributed nothing to their discovery, but which can not under the existing law be effectively controlled in the disposition or development of the deposits. Similar results will follow future discoveries at Government expense.

The Secretary of the Interior in his last annual report has called my attention to the fact that the withdrawal act in its present form grants the Executive no authority to protect land valuable for their content of potash or nitrates, both of which should be developed in the public interest for the present and future agricultural needs of the Nation.

The act now reads:

That all lands withdrawn under the provisions of this act shall at all times be open to exploration, discovery, occupation, and purchase under the mining laws of the United States, so far as the same apply to minerals other than coal, oil, gas, and phosphates.

This omits both potash and nitrates from the protection of the law.

The Secretary's ideas of the amendment necessary to correct this condition are embodied in Senate bill 5679, introduced by Senator SMOOT on March 8, 1912. The immediate enactment of this amendment or one of similar tenor will confer upon the Executive the authority necessary to protect these valuable deposits until such time as Congress may enact further legislation providing for their proper disposition. I urge that such action be taken immediately.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE (H. DOC. NO. 643).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In several messages to Congress I have expressed my wish for a revision of the present tariff, schedule by schedule, when justified by an adequate knowledge of the facts regarding each industry, as shown by an impartial and nonpartisan inquiry. In order to secure such an impartial inquiry into the facts, I established, under the authority vested in me by law, a Tariff Board of five members. On December 20, 1911, I transmitted to the Congress a report of the board on Schedule K (wool and manufactures of). The board was unanimous in its findings of fact, and on the basis of these findings I recommended a revision of that schedule.

I now transmit a report of the Tariff Board on Schedule I (cotton manufactures). In this report also the board is unanimous in its findings. On the basis of the report, I now recommend that the Congress proceed to a consideration of this schedule with a view to its revision and a reduction of its rates.

I base this recommendation on the declaration of the platform on which I was elected, that a reasonable protective tariff should be adjusted to the difference in cost of production at home and abroad.

The report of the board shows the difficulty of stating in general terms difference in costs of production for a great variety of cotton manufactures. These differences vary widely according to the character of the particular fabric.

In the manufacture of cotton cloth there are three main branches of the industry—spinning, weaving, and finishing. The report shows that the cost of spinning cotton yarn in this country is greater than in the leading competing country. In the case of ordinary warp and filling yarns, forming the bulk of the production of the domestic industry, the foreign cost of turning cotton into yarn is shown to be about 70 per cent of the domestic cost.

The duty on these yarns is two or three times in excess of the difference in cost of production. On some highly specialized yarns, and on yarns of the highest count—that is, of greatest fineness—the duty in some cases about equalizes the difference in conversion costs. In many cases, however, on the higher grades of yarn which are produced in this country, the duty is in excess of the difference in the cost of production, though by a much less amount than in the case of ordinary warp and filling yarns.

The difference in the cost of weaving yarn into cloth as between this country and its chief competitor varies according to the character of the fabric. In the case of many cloths of plain weave the American cost of weaving seems to be lower than the foreign cost, due to the greater number of looms tended per weaver in this country. This reduces the labor cost per yard despite the higher earnings of the American weaver. This conclusion is further substantiated by the fact that cloths of this description are sold by the domestic manufacturer in this country at prices as low as those charged by the foreign manufacturer in his own country. In proportion, however, as the fabrics become more complicated (and therefore permit of fewer looms per weaver), the American cost of production increases. In the case of most fancy fabrics of complicated weaves the cost of weaving is higher in this country, but on such fabrics the present duties are in excess of any difference in cost, and in many cases are in excess of the total conversion cost in this country.

The cost of finishing (that is, bleaching, printing, dyeing, and mercerizing) is about the same in this country and in the leading competing country. The extra duties imposed under the present law by reason of these processes are in excess of the difference in the extra cost due to finishing, and are often in excess of the total domestic cost of finishing.

The report further shows that in the case of a large variety of fabrics, which permit of the use of many looms per weaver, the prices at which goods are sold by the American manufacturer are as low as the prices charged by the foreign manufacturer in his own market, and in many cases lower. On the finer goods mill prices in this country are higher than abroad, due in part, at least, to the higher cost of production here. In few cases, however, is the mill price in this country increased by anything like the full amount of the duty.

One the other hand, the prices paid by consumers in this country are higher than abroad, even where the prices received by the manufacturers are the same in both countries. This is a result of a system of distribution under which the margin between the manufacturer's price and the retail price is much greater than abroad. This is partly due both to the higher cost of distribution and to the established practice in the cotton retail trade of selling fabrics at customary fixed or "set" prices.

Under the existing system of distribution a slight reduction of duties would in some cases materially reduce the price to the consumer, while in other cases a large reduction of the duties would not change the price to the American consumer at all. These matters are set forth fully in the report of the board, which presents in impartial manner the necessary facts on which an intelligent revision of this schedule can be based.

I therefore recommend that the Congress proceed to such a revision without delay.

Before closing this message, I desire to bring the attention of Congress to the fact that the labor and expense involved in the reports by the Tariff Commission upon Schedule K (wool and manufactures of) and upon Schedule I (cotton manufactures) have been such as nearly to exhaust the appropriation. The pressure under which these investigations and reports were made involved a greater outlay than will be necessary in the investigation and report upon the remaining schedules in the tariff law. Heretofore the expenditure has averaged about $30,000 per month since the appropriation became available July 1, 1911. The board, through its chairman, Mr. Emery, advises me that $20,000 per month, in addition to the sum on hand, would enable them to continue regular work upon other schedules directed by me until the end of the fiscal year June 30, 1912. I therefore urge the appropriation, as a deficiency appropriation, of $60,000, to enable the board to continue its valuable work during the months of April, May, and June.

I can not emphasize too much the importance that I attribute to the work of the board. The reports already made by the board are most valuable in advising the Congress and the people of the actual conditions under which these schedules operate and of the changes that ought to be made to make more equitable their effect.

I have directed the board to take up the metal schedule, the leather schedule, the chemical schedule, and the sugar schedule, and I sincerely hope that appropriations, not only for the current fiscal year, but ample appropriations for the next year, will be made by Congress, in order that this Congress in its next session, and its successors, may have the benefit of the information which will certainly result from a continuance of the services of the Tariff Board.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 45. An act affecting the town sites of Timber Lake and Dupree, in South Dakota, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SERVICE PENSIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate House bill No. 1, in compliance with the order heretofore entered by the Senate by unanimous consent.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, to those who were volunteers in the Civil War on either side of the struggle, and who knew the opinion of their opponents through mutual intercourse under flags of truce or as prisoners of war, some of the views adduced during the discussion on this floor of the pending measures have a very strange and curious sound, for the suggestion then to the soldiers of the Union Army who volunteered to fight for the flag of their country that in the days to come it would be claimed by them or anyone speaking for them that on that account they would be entitled to a money reward, or, as stated by the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] during this discussion, that their patriotism was to be measured by the standard of dollars and cents, would have been resented as a deadly insult. But those days are far removed in the past, and it seems that changing sentiments have come with the changing years.

On the subject of these pension bills I speak from the standpoint of an ex-Confederate soldier who deemed it his duty to volunteer to resist the invasion of his State, and who has never had and who never will have any apology to make for the course he then pursued, but who long ago accepted in good faith the result of the Civil War, believing that it was best that we should have one rather than a divided Nation, who has raised his children to honor and love and revere its flag, and who has taught his sons to understand that it was their duty to be always ready to fight and, if necessary, to die to protect the honor of that flag.

I have no feeling save that of respect for the veterans of the North who were actuated by principle, as were the veterans of the South. But I must confess that this feeling on my part extends in the fullest degree only to those who like myself were volunteers, and only in a limited degree to those who were conscripts, and not at all to those who were hirelings for either Government bounty or private substitute money.

I have said that I have no feeling save that of respect for those volunteers who were actuated by principle, and it gives me very great pleasure to publicly testify here that during the discussion of measures pending before the Senate requiring a reference to the time or the events of the Civil War during my time of service here, only one remark has been made at which an ex-Confederate soldier could justly take offense, and I am glad that I was not present when that remark was made. But on all other occasions a due and kindly regard for the sensibilities of southern soldiers has been shown by those northern Senators who did not and could not be expected to believe that the cause of the South was right. I specially recall two instances of this character, one being the remarks of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], which brought him through me a handshake from a brother Confederate veteran in the State of Louisiana who had read his remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a handshake which was cordially given and as cordially returned, and the other was the remarks of the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], himself a Union veteran, who, later on, in the kindness of his heart and generosity of his nature, said that he would like to see the National Government provide for the aged and indigent Confederate veterans. For this sentiment I, in common with all Confederate soldiers, thank him from the depths of my heart.

But I am sure that I speak the sentiments not only of my surviving Confederate brethren, but also of the people of the South when I say that even if the National Government were to make such an offer it would, though deeply appreciated, be declined.

The South prefers herself to provide for her old and indigent survivors of the Civil War, not as she would like to do, but as best she can, through pensions and homes for veterans; and this she has been doing for long years in the past and will continue to do for all years in the future until the last of them have gone where they need no earthly help.

I feel sure, likewise, that I speak the sentiments of the people of the South when I say that though they stand amazed, as all the world stands amazed, at the magnitude of the pension roll of this Government on account of the Civil War, yet they have no complaint to make against adequate provision by the Government for all aged or indigent veterans of the Civil War, who, on account of wounds or disabilities or diseases or on account of old age preventing them from work, are unable to make a support, and they are likewise willing that this provision should be extended to their needy widows and children.

They are willing to bear their share of the burden of the pension roll while receiving so few of its benefits. But I am not willing that they or any other section of this country should be saddled with a burden that I do not think they should be properly saddled with, and therefore I am opposed to these indiscriminate service pension bills.

I wish to say that I am willing to pension every single Union veteran who was honorably discharged from the service, who on account of wounds or sickness contracted in the line of duty is not able to support himself, and I am perfectly willing to extend that bounty to his widow or his children who stand in need. I would not confine this to the length of service, because it might well be that those who volunteered later during the war could have been actuated by patriotic motives, as much so as were those who volunteered at an earlier time in the service; nor would I limit it to those who had actually been in battle, because, having been a soldier myself, I know that soldiers must remain where they are stationed and that they can not all be on the fighting line. I can afford to say this, because my own command was always in the field and in front of the enemy and enjoys the distinction of having had said of it by the general commanding the department, in a book written by him since the close of the Civil War, that it was always in the front on an advance and always in the rear on a retreat.

As I have said, I am willing also to give this bounty to their widows and to their children who are needy and who have no relatives able and willing also to support them. But I must recognize the fact that as a Member of the lawmaking body of this country I have assumed an obligation toward all classes of our citizens, and I would not feel justified in unduly helping one class to the detriment, or, at least, at the expense, of all other classes.

I may be wrong, and if so I am very sorry for it; but I can not help believing that the motives which actuated the passage of the Sherwood pension bill by the House of Representatives were as much political as patriotic, if not more so, and I can not agree with the statement recently made on this floor to the effect that because the surviving veterans of the Civil War are few in number and consequently have not much political influence, therefore their just claims to pensions can be slighted with impunity by Congress. I believe that the very contrary is true, for I believe that the organized pension interest of this country, consisting, as it does, not merely of the half million, in round numbers, of veterans left behind, but of all their descendants, numbering in the millions, with the pension agents behind them, exercise a more potent influence in shaping legislation in Congress than any other class of citizens, not even excepting organized labor.

Now, when I have assisted in passing legislation to provide for all aged and indigent Union veterans and for their widows and for their children who stand in need of it, I feel that I have assisted in discharging the full measure of debt that this country may owe to its Civil War veterans; but if I should go further than that I would feel that I had not properly discharged my duty to the remaining citizens of this country.

Holding these views, I can not vote for the Sherwood pension bill or for the substitute reported by the committee or for any other bill embodying those same general provisions.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, in order to bring to the attention of the Senate the difference in the pension bills now being considered, the House bill No. 1, and the Senate substitute, I desire to call attention to the rates fixed in each:

Sixteenth proposition (eleventh modified).

SMOOT AMENDMENT.

	90 days.	6 months.	9 months.	1 year.	1½ years.	2 years.	2½ years.	3 years and over.
Age:

66	15.00	15.50	[1]	16.00	16.50	17.00	17.50	18.00
70	18.00	19.00	[1]	20.00	21.00	22.00	23.00	24.00
75	21.00	22.50	[1]	24.00	25.50	27.00	28.50	30.00

SHERWOOD BILL.

All ages	$15.00	$20.00	$25.00	$30.00	[1]	[1]	[1]	[1]

[1] No rate.

It will be noticed that the Sherwood bill, or House bill No. 1, provides for a service pension, while the Smoot substitute combines both age and service.

There has been much said and more printed in regard to the difference in the cost of each measure. It will be seen that the friends of House bill No. 1 and those who oppose it do not agree as to what it will cost. Mr. SHERWOOD, who prepared the bill and has studied it, estimates the cost of that bill to be $43,056,210. These figures were made upon the basis that there are 488,712 Union soldiers on the pension roll, but later information gives the number as 456,336, and a few days ago the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] gave the number as 421,000. So it will be seen that Mr. SHERWOOD placed his estimate too high.

The officers of the Pension Bureau estimate that the Sherwood bill would increase the appropriation for pensions to $72,000,000, but the first year the increase would be about $32,000,000. The difference in these estimates is explained by the fact that Mr. SHERWOOD bases his figures upon the records as to service in the War Department, while the statistics upon which the Pension Bureau based the length of service were obtained from 475,000 statistical cards gathered about 20 years ago.

For one I do not intend to try to harmonize these differences, because I do not believe it is just to the Union soldiers to measure their services in dollars and cents. I believe they should be given the most liberal pension possible.

It is estimated that the Smoot substitute would increase the appropriation about $11,500,000 the first year, $33,000,000 the second year, and $21,000,000 the third year. But, as I said before, I am not going to argue the question of cost, because I do not think it fair to do so. The soldiers did not stop to count the estimate to themselves and others near and dear to them when they offered their lives for the preservation of the Union.

THE COST OF LIVING.

In connection with the question of the cost of living I would like to call the attention of the Senate to a letter from a former Member of this body, a man with whom you might not have agreed upon public questions, but a man for whose honesty and sincerity you had the highest regard.

715 WEST TENTH STREET,
Topeka, Kans., December 7, 1911.

Hon. CHARLES CURTIS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: When the pension question is taken up in the Senate a statement showing the cost of living may come handy.

I am now getting $60 every three months.

Here is what I am paying for same period for room, meals, and laundry:

Room rent	$30.00
Meals	55.80
Laundry	12.12
Total	97.92

And this does not include any allowance for clothing or body wear of any kind.

Respectfully, W. A. PEFFER.

Here is an old soldier who served his country well, a man whom you all know, who draws a pension of $60 every three months, and he states—and no man who knows him but will believe he lives as economically as possible, that he spends in three months $97.92.

INMATES OF THE NATIONAL HOMES.

There has been something said in this debate about the inmates of the national homes. There are about 25,000 inmates of the nine homes, and I have received a number of letters claiming if the House bill should be enacted into law that 90 per cent of those inmates who are able to be about would withdraw from the homes.

To those who are hesitating on account of the cost I desire to ask you to consider this fact, that since 1897, as compared with 1910, the per cent of increase in the ordinary expenses of the United States Government has been as follows, and without reading it I desire to print a table giving the comparison referred to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Georgia in the chair). In the absence of objection, permission to do so is granted.

The comparison referred to is as follows:

Comparison showing the ordinary expenses of the United States Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, compared with the expenditures of Congress for the year ending June 30, 1910.

	Expended 1897.	Expended 1910.	Increase, 1910 over 1897.	Increase.

Compiled from official sources. Aggregate expenses for the years named for ordinary expenses can be verified by the World Almanac for 1912, page 256.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, this comparison shows that with the pensions granted to the soldiers of the Spanish War, with the increase to widows from $8 to $12 per month under the act of 1908, with the increase given to the soldiers of the Mexican and Civil Wars under the act of 1907, the increase for pensions has been only 13.7 per cent, while that of the War Department has been 218 per cent, the Navy 256 per cent, rivers and harbors 83 per cent, and the Diplomatic and Consular Service 215 per cent.

In view of these figures, is it fair to the soldiers to say that if you increase the appropriation for pensions a few million dollars it will necessitate the issuance of bonds?

This great, rich, and prosperous country of ours is amply able to meet its obligations, and if this dollar-a-day bill is enacted into law there will be no trouble in providing for the increased cost.

I fear we do not fully realize the magnitude of the Civil War. In the Revolutionary War there were 1,736 killed in battle; in the Mexican War there were killed 1,049; in the War with Spain 247, making a total in the three wars of 3,031 killed, while in a single battle in the Civil War, the great battle of Gettysburg, which was the turning of the tide, the beginning of the end, there were 3,072 killed on the Union side. There were more killed in that one battle than in the three wars mentioned.

This great country of ours, the leading Nation in the world, can well afford to support the men who fought the battles which saved the Union. Personally I do not believe we should count the dollars the bill will carry. We should remember the great service the Union soldiers rendered, and pass the bill in justice to the survivors of that wonderful army.

They did not count the cost. When President Lincoln called, they simply answered "We are coming, Father Abraham, three hundred thousand strong."

They gave up their all and offered their lives to preserve the Union, and this Government should provide for them in their old age.

In the report signed by a minority who favored the House bill, we contended its enactment into law would reduce the running expenses of the Pension Bureau; and for one, I have heard nothing in this debate to cause me to change my mind. It surely would reduce the number of pension examiners, the number of examining surgeons, and after the first certificates were issued no new ones would be required.

I ask my colleagues on this side to remember the promise of our party in every national platform since 1864. With the permission of the Senate, I will print in my remarks a portion of the platform of 1908.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Another Republican policy which must ever be maintained is that of generous appreciation for those who have fought the country's battles and for the widows and orphans of those who have fallen. We commend the increase of the widows' pension made by the present Congress, and declare for a liberal administration of all pension laws to the end that the people's gratitude may grow deeper as the memories of the heroic sacrifices grow more sacred with the passing years.

Remember what President Taft said in his message of December 4, 1910. He said:

PENSIONS.

The uniform policy of the Government in the matter of granting pensions to those gallant and devoted men who fought to save the life of the Nation in the perilous days of the great Civil War has always been of the most liberal character. Those men are now rapidly passing away. The best obtainable official statistics show that they are dying at the rate of something over 3,000 a month, and, in view of their advancing years, this rate must inevitably, in proportion, rapidly increase. To the man who risked everything on the field of battle to save the Nation in the hour of its direst need we owe a debt which has not been and should not be computed in a begrudging or parsimonious spirit. But while we should be actuated by this spirit to the soldier himself, care should be exercised not to go to absurd lengths, or distribute the bounty of the Government to classes of persons who may, at this late day, from a mere mercenary motive, seek to obtain some legal relation with an old veteran now tottering on the brink of the grave. The true spirit of the pension laws is to be found in the noble sentiments expressed by Mr. Lincoln in his last inaugural address, wherein, in speaking of the Nation's duty to its soldiers when the struggle should be over, he said we should "care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and orphans."

In this conection I desire to call to the attention of the Senate a newspaper clipping, which I just received by this morning's mail, with a picture of an old veteran who died a few days ago in Kansas City, Mo. It states:

The body of R. F. Couk, veteran of Shiloh, Gettysburg, and Bull Run, lies on a couch in the little parlor of the home of his son-in-law, J. E. Miller, 1321 Paseo, where he died Saturday morning. The drizzling rain is filling an open grave in the little Couk lot in Oak Park Cemetery, dug before it was learned that neither Couk or his son-in-law had money. The potter's field at Leeds alone is open to accept the body of this patriot who fought under the star-emblazoned flag.

Oh, it is sad that such things should occur, and yet here you have the case of a veteran of the Civil War, who, because he happened to die without leaving any money and his son-in-law, a poor, hard-working man, having been out of employment and unable to pay the expenses, is laid away in the potter's field. If you pass this $1-a-day bill and give to the old soldier a liberal pension, you will not have this kind of an article printed throughout this land; and it is a pity that such things should occur in this great, rich country of ours.

Remember what the soldiers did and what they gave up when they joined the Army, and what they and theirs suffered during the war and what they have suffered since. I ask you to remember what they did when the war was over. Thousands of them were pioneers to the West and the Northwest. They suffered in the new and undeveloped section, and they have helped to build up great States.

Since the war, when great questions were to be settled, you found them, their sons, and sons-in-law, voting to uphold the credit of our Government. When the question of protection was at stake they voted for the American policy and stood by the industries of our country.

Senators, I ask you to remember that the legislatures of 22 States have urged the enactment by Congress of liberal pension legislation. They are New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Connecticut, Maine, Colorado, Kansas, Nebraska, Washington, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Minnesota, Oregon, Massachusetts, South Dakota, Utah, and Wyoming.

Remember the members of the grand army, which 50 years ago made the earth tremble beneath their mighty tread, who are now bent with age, and who will soon answer the last call. They are not looking now to new countries to develop, they are not looking for new enterprises in which to engage, but they are dreaming of the past, quietly waiting for the last call. Thousands of them to-day are waiting upon the action of this body upon these pension bills, and they are praying that this Congress may give them what they are entitled to—the bill passed by the House of Representatives. Thirty-six thousand of them passed away last year.

I had a letter yesterday, written by the commander of a Grand Army post in a city in Kansas, which 10 months ago boasted of 40 members of the Grand Army of the Republic, stating that in 10 months 14 of their number have been laid away. That will explain to the Senate more strikingly than anything I could say how fast the old soldiers are passing away. Thousands of those who remain are poor and helpless. They risked their lives in battle for the preservation of the Union that our Government should not perish from the earth.

I hope the substitute may be voted down and that the House bill may pass. If such action is taken, it will give joy and happiness to 456,000 soldiers who demonstrated their loyalty to the Union when brave men were needed.

I ask the Senate to vote down the substitute and then pass the dollar-a-day bill, which has passed the House. I ask this because, no matter what bill you enact into law, you can not repay the soldiers for the hardships and sufferings they have endured.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, since the Senator from Kansas has concluded his remarks—I did not desire to interrupt him while he was speaking—I should like the view of the Senator upon this proposition: Suppose exactly the same amount should be appropriated under the double standard adopted by the committee, which recognizes the disability of age as well as service, would the Senator then say that in his opinion a purely service pension bill would be more equitable than would one which recognized both the disability of age and the length of service?

Mr. CURTIS. I will say very frankly to the Senator, that if the committee had reported a liberal, double-standard measure, which recognized both age and service, and which, in my judgment, was more liberal than the House bill, I should have supported it; but I say to the Senator that, so far as I am concerned, I believe the most liberal pension we can grant will not do justice nor pay the debt, nor even come near paying the debt, the Government owes to the Union soldier.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think I understand the Senator from Kansas. If I understand him correctly, his answer would be to this effect, that if both measures carried the same appropriation, he would prefer the one providing for the double standard.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have heretofore expressed my views on the general subject of the pending service-pension bill as passed by the House of Representatives and the SMOOT substitute. I only want to take a very few moments in some further meditation concerning the only objections which I have heard raised to the Sherwood bill. I have no prepared address on this subject, but since the address of the distinguished junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] there have been running through my mind a few thoughts on this subject that I think ought to be uttered. I always listen with interest to what the distinguished junior Senator from Ohio has to say. He illuminates his subject, and, furthermore, I have a very close attachment for Ohio, having been born in that State, although when I reached years of discretion removed to Iowa. I gather from the strong argument which he has made that the great objection and only objection to the Sherwood bill is that we can not afford it.

In the course of his address he referred the Senator from Nebraska to the words of Past Commander Eli Torrance, and commended these words to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska:

> Of course, if the Government is not able to do what we ask, I do not think any old soldier wants the Government to do it. I would be sorry if any old soldier felt that way.

That is, the old soldier is not asking the Government to do something it is not able to do. Does anyone claim we are not able to do what is right and just to the soldier?

And again, in the remarks of the distinguished Senator, he said, referring to the enlarged expenditure necessary:

> How shall this be met? It must be in one of two ways—either by immediately increasing taxation or by issuing bonds which must be paid by future taxation.

And again, in the remarks of the distinguished Senator:

> There is not a dollar paid out for pensions which does not represent a dollar of taxes which some man must pay, and the great portion of the taxes of this country is paid by those who can illy afford to do so.

My first enthusiasm in the cause of the soldiers came to me from association with a gallant old soldier from the State of Ohio—Capt. J. A. O. Yeoman—a man who went out a mere boy and served four years in the Army, with such distinguished service that the Congress of the United States voted him $2,000 as a reward for that distinguished service and gave him what was of more value to him—a resolution of thanks. As a boy, I studied law in his office and listened to his stories of war days and war hardships. He never had a pension. He never asked for one, because he felt he could battle with the hardships of life, but he believed that every deserving soldier should be in old age cared for by the Government he saved. From that day on I have always felt that the question of economy never should enter into the deliberations of Congress where the soldiers of this country were involved. The question of economy was not considered by them when they marched away to war.

Besides these Ohio connections, the Sherwood bill came from Ohio. The distinguished soldier, Gen. Sherwood, who sits here at my side, and who, I believe, is the best friend the soldiers have in this country, is the father of the Sherwood bill. He has to his credit great years of service to his country in the war. Now, in his older age, he is fighting a battle in Congress for justice to the soldiers of the Civil War. Hence, I could not help having a little feeling of regret that the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], with his distinguished service, should preach a philosophy of economy where the soldiers are involved.

"We can not afford it!" That is the only objection that is raised against this bill. It costs too much. We must issue bonds or increase taxes; and every dollar of pensions means, according to him, a dollar for somebody to pay as taxes.

Whence the birth of this great cry of economy? Has it ever been whispered before? There is another way besides taxes, and another way besides bonds, of raising this money. However, it may be said in this connection that there is an excise tax law coming over here in a few days, if it is not here now. Some man on the floor of the House the other day wondered what the Government was going to do with the money that would be raised by the excise tax. Here is a good place to put it. Let wealth pay its great burden of taxes to take care of the men who made it possible for wealth to accumulate.

But I have firmly fixed in my mind the third way of taking care of this soldier question—by practicing a little economy in the administration of the Government.

Some years ago Congress raised its salaries. Where was the voice then for economy? On the very day the distinguished Senator from Ohio was preaching this doctrine of economy, or on the very day his speech was published in the RECORD, the Senate voted $1,400,000 for public buildings. I am not opposed to public buildings where it is right and proper that they should be constructed. I am not in favor of stopping great works of internal improvements. But it does seem to me that when we vote away a million and a half dollars with but little consideration, we are in a poor position to be preaching economy on this one great question.

One of these palatial public buildings was at the beautiful city of Sundance, in Wyoming, with its 281 energetic people. Ten years ago Sundance had 291 people; but in the progress of events this great city, 50 miles from a railroad, with postal receipts of about $2,400 a year, has lost 10 of its great citizenship. And we find ourselves, when we are talking economy about the soldier, appropriating $75,000 for a public building at Sundance!

If Sundance keeps on losing in population as it has in the last 10 years, in another 10 years, when this magnificent Government building is constructed, the entire population of Sundance can gather in some of the rooms, or in the magnificent elevators, and be absolutely lonesome, and Sundance will be indeed a deserted village.

Again, there is Thermopolis, which has more of a historic sound than Sundance, which has not the same romance seeming to surround it as Sundance, and with a far greater population. Why, mark you, Thermopolis has nearly a thousand people. And on the very same day we appropriated $67,000 for Thermopolis.

St. George—that has not so romantic a sound as Sundance, and savors somewhat of war and fight and dragons—we voted $65,000 for St. George, with postal receipts of about $2,600 per year.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Georgia in the chair). Will the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I understand that the Senator in my absence——

Mr. KENYON. I did not know that.

Mr. WARREN. The same as another Senator, in my absence and that of my colleague, alluded to Sundance, Wyo., and the population of Sundance.

Mr. KENYON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARREN. What did the Senator say it was?

Mr. KENYON. Two hundred and eighty-one people.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that he was not right, nor nearly right.

Mr. KENYON. I have the bulletin of the census of the United States.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; and the Senator is simply quoting one precinct.

Mr. KENYON. This is the bulletin for 1910.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is simply quoting one precinct. If he will look under it he will find the population of the other precinct stated.

Mr. KENYON. Has the other precinct as many people as the one I quoted?

Mr. WARREN. It has more than that one.

Mr. KENYON. What, then, is the population of Sundance?

Mr. WARREN. I do not know what it is at this hour. I will take occasion later to tell the Senator. But I know what the census reports; and it does not report it at the figure as the Senator from Iowa has stated, and as the Senator from Tennessee stated.

Mr. KENYON. I have stated it as I gathered it from the bulletin.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator did not gather it correctly.

Mr. KENYON. Will not the Senator enlighten us then as to what the population of Sundance is?

Mr. WARREN. I will do that in my own time.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. LEA. I think the difference between the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Wyoming is, perhaps, that the Senator from Iowa is referring only to the metropolis of Sundance, the incorporated community, while the Senator from Wyoming is referring to the precincts. The bulletin shows, according to my recollection, that Sundance town—the metropolis, Sundance town—has, at this time, 281 people in it.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator is referring to the metropolis now?

Mr. LEA. In answer to the Senator's reference to what was done in his absence, I desire to state to him that no advantage was taken or attempted to be taken of his absence; that only a motion to reconsider was entered, and that motion was not brought up. It was done on that day because the rules provide that a motion to reconsider must be entered within two days; and I thought the appropriation so outrageous that I did not want by any possibility to have the two days elapse. Therefore I was unwilling to wait longer than the second calendar day, although two legislative days may be meant in the rules relative to reconsidering bills.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me one word——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. KENYON. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. WARREN. On the day that the Senator from Tennessee brought up the matter, he still had the balance of that day and the next day within which to enter notice of reconsideration. I was at work at the time upon the business of the Senate in the Military Affairs Committee room, within 70 feet of where the Senator was. The doorkeepers knew where I was. The Senator not only entered the motion of reconsideration, which was all right, and could have been done as well when my colleague and myself were absent as otherwise, but he went on in a speech, in which he stated that Sundance has a population of 281 people. That has gone out all through the newspapers. I was not here to contradict it; my colleague was not here to contradict it; and the Senator has thus put me and the town and State in a wrong position.

Of course, the old saying is that no matter how innocently a lie is told, a lie travels a thousand miles while the truth is geting its boots on; and that is probably the case now.

The census shows that Sundance has two precincts. The population of the precincts is given differently than in prior census reports. Ten years ago they were given together. In my own time I shall take up the matter. The Senator was in error then. I understood that the Senator from Iowa mentioned Sundance as having a population of 281.

Mr. KENYON. I did. That was my understanding.

Mr. WARREN. Then I am correct in saying to the Senator that it is not a true statement, as the census report will show.

Mr. KENYON. I certainly accept the Senator's statement; but I should like to inquire what is the population of Sundance?

Mr. WARREN. I will take that up in my own time.

Mr. LEA. Will the Senator from Iowa yield further to me for a moment?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. LEA. I desire to state that I was not blessed with information as to where the Senator from Wyoming was on that day, and, as the RECORD will show, my motion was not entered until practically the close of the proceedings of that day. I made a very brief statement as to the population of Sundance, and at the suggestion of a friend—a colleague of the Senator—I withdrew even that statement from the RECORD; so that he could be done no injustice in the matter in his absence.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator did not withdraw it, however, from the newspapers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa still has the floor.

Mr. KENYON. If the Senator from Wyoming will tell me what the population of Sundance is, I will yield.

Mr. WARREN. The population of Sundance is somewhat larger than the populations of certain towns in Iowa were when they had post-office buildings; while in this case it is only a bill for a public building and a long way short of a completed building. It is a bill for a building intended to house not only a post office, but also one of the largest land offices in the State, one that has control over perhaps more land than any other land office, and also a large number of foresters and others.

Mr. KENYON. Before the Senator sits down I will ask him to please tell me the population of Sundance. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARREN. I will tell the Senator the population of Sundance when I get the floor in my own right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa yields to the Senator from Wyoming, as the Chair understands, to give the population of Sundance.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a moment.

Mr. KENYON. Very gladly.

Mr. LEA. I desire to make the observation that I do not think the Senator from Iowa is quite fair in attempting to pin the Senator from Wyoming down to an answer now. Sundance may grow in the meantime, and there may be therefore a perfectly proper reason for withholding the information.

Mr. KENYON. But does not the Senator remember that Sundance has decreased in population in the last 10 years?

Mr. LEA. And I desire to say just one word more. The figures I have given in regard to this matter of population are the figures which have been given by the census enumerator. I imagine that that record is correct, and by it I am willing to stand.

Mr. WARREN. The figures are correct as to one precinct only.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. KENYON. I yielded in order that the Senator might tell me the population of Sundance, and I am trying to get it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. LEA. Will the Senator yield while I ask the Senator from Wyoming how many precincts there are in the city of Sundance?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Iowa has not yielded.
Mr. LEA. Will the Senator yield for that purpose?
Mr. KENYON. I will.
Mr. WARREN. Now, what is the question?
Mr. LEA. How many precincts are there in the city of Sundance?
Mr. WARREN. There are two.
Mr. LEA. That is, in the incorporated town?
Mr. WARREN. Yes.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.
Mr. KENYON. I feel that I have not gotten much sunlight on the proposition of the population of Sundance. But I referred to this, not because of Sundance, but merely as an example. I know that the Senator from Wyoming was a great soldier, with a great record; and I have brought up this matter only to enter my protest against expending public funds in that way. Whether or not a pension question is involved I am going to enter my protest just as long as I am here against public buildings where they are not needed, whether in Iowa or anywhere else.
Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield for a moment?
Mr. KENYON. Yes, sir.
Mr. WARREN. The census will show that the State of Iowa is pretty well provided for, and that every town of 5,000 people or more, with the exception of two, already has a public building, and about 10 towns or cities have public buildings where the population runs from less than 2,000 up to 3,000 and 4,000. These are buildings already constructed. It is not a case of the introduction of a bill for a building hereafter to be constructed.
Mr. KENYON. If there are any towns in Iowa no larger than Sundance that have received appropriations for Government buildings, I am sorry.
Mr. WARREN. There are towns in Iowa that were very much smaller than Sundance when bills were introduced, and passed the Senate, providing public buildings for them. I want to say, parenthetically, and I shall again state at the proper time, that the average period that elapses between the time a bill enters the Senate to even authorize the purchase of a site and the time of the authorization is between four and five years. The average time after a limit of cost is put upon the building, as per the figures of the Treasury Department, and before an appropriation is made, is between five and six years. So that when a measure comes in here in its first form it is sure to be something like 10 years before a building is completed.
Apparently, some of the towns of Iowa, like the towns of other States, have had such rapid growth that public buildings have been authorized very early. There are to-day public buildings in towns in this country where there are less than 1,000 people, and even less than 400 people; and I presume they are necessary there.
Mr. KENYON. Does not the Senator think that we might wait a few years for buildings and devote this money to pensions? That is the point I am making.
Mr. WARREN. Undoubtedly.
Mr. KENYON. It will be but a few years, and in the meantime we can pass a liberal pension bill and turn the money to that purpose.
Mr. WARREN. Undoubtedly; and I am very glad that the controlling party of the House, in caucus last night, decided, I understand, to have no public-building bill this year. I think, myself, that we should go slowly in those matters, as we ought to do in the case of rivers and harbors and many other appropriations.
Mr. KENYON. I did not know we had gone so slowly in the case of rivers and harbors.
Mr. WARREN. We have a chance now to practice economy in that direction, although the State of my friend from Tennessee is represented by something like a million dollars in a measure that is now being prepared.
Mr. KENYON. I know I was asked to introduce a bill for a public building in a town in Iowa of about 4,000 people, and I refused to do it. I took the position that I would economize as to public buildings in order that we should do a little more liberal justice to the soldiers for the next few years, and then we could have our public buildings if necessary.
Mr. SUTHERLAND and Mr. LEA addressed the Chair.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield, and to whom?
Mr. KENYON. I yield first to get the population of Sundance.
Mr. LEA. Will the Senator allow me a moment?
Mr. KENYON. I will yield first to the Senator from Utah. Can the Senator tell me the population of Sundance?
Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Iowa stated that he had declined to introduce a bill to provide for a public building for some town in Iowa. Will he give the name of the town?
Mr. KENYON. If you will give me the population of Sundance I will tell you the name of the town.
Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana has risen to a point of order, which he will state.
Mr. KERN. The Senators on this side of the Chamber are surely entitled to this flow of wit and eloquence, but we are unable to hear what is said.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point is well taken.
Mr. KENYON. Why does the Senator from Utah ask the question? Does he doubt the truth of my statement?
Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not at all. I was curious to know what was the town.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is afraid the Senator from Utah is not now being heard.
Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am a little curious to know for what town in Iowa the Senator from Iowa had declined to introduce a public-building bill.
Mr. KENYON. Of course I assume that the Senator's question impugns the truthfulness of what I said.
Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not at all. I do not think the veracity of the Senator from Iowa is impugned by asking him a civil question.
Mr. KENYON. Why do you ask the question?
Mr. SUTHERLAND. Because I am curious on the subject.
Mr. KENYON. I am curious to know the population of Sundance.
Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator said it is a town which has a population of 4,000. Did the Senator decline to introduce the bill on the ground that the population would decrease steadily in the future as the population in Iowa has steadily decreased for so many years?
Mr. KENYON. No, sir.
Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, the Senator recognizes that in the Rocky Mountain States the population is steadily growing. My own State has advanced in population over 60 per cent. The State of Iowa seems to have completed its population some years ago, and it has been for many years steadily decreasing. So I can understand why the Senator should not be willing to introduce a public-building bill for one of those towns, because if they decrease in population to a point——
Mr. KERN. Mr. President, again I rise to a question of order.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana rises to a question of order, which he will state.
Mr. KERN. Such questions as those propounded by the Senator from Utah to the Senator from Iowa constitute a violation of Senatorial courtesy.
Mr. LEA. Will the Senator from Iowa now yield to me?
Mr. KENYON. Certainly.
Mr. LEA. Mr. President, with reference to the statement made by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] in regard to the million dollars that may be in some bill in favor of Tennessee, I will say to the Senator from Wyoming that, as he well knows, I have had nothing to do with any of the items in that bill. When that bill comes before the Senate I will join with the Senator from Wyoming in seeing that Tennessee does not get anything which she is not justly entitled to. And I will ask the Senator to join with me in doing the same thing in regard to the State of Wyoming.
Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, I shall be very glad to do that. The State of Wyoming has never had a penny from river and harbor acts. It never has had a penny for any other purpose that was not right and that it did not deserve.
The State of Wyoming has sixty-odd million acres of land, all but 400,000 acres of which are retained by the United States. The money from those lands goes into the United States Treasury. The State of Tennessee has always had the benefit of all her lands and the State of Tennessee has had some fifteen million dollars out of the United States. The State of Wyoming has given the United States more millions than that, and the lands that still remain amount to over $600,000,000 at the valuation the United States placed upon them in the organic act and since.
Mr. LEA. I am very glad to have heard that statement from the Senator from Wyoming because I know, forsooth, that it must mean he will join with me in asking to have the bill reconsidered appropriating $75,000 for a public building at Sundance.

Mr. WARREN. I shall do that unless I show the Senate that the town deserves the public building.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I was proceeding in a quiet, leisurely way, but I have been somewhat drawn away from my argument by these various suggestions.

I will say to the Senator from Utah he need not have any particular concern about the population of Iowa decreasing or about Iowa's citizenship. We may lose some in our population in quantity, but we have not lost any in quality, and we certainly have helped the population of Utah and Wyoming by the removal of some of our people to those States.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Iowa yield for a moment to me?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say that Iowa has been most liberal in her people. We have a great many of them in Wyoming, and they are excellent citizens. I hope we may have a great many more of them. In the meantime, I hope that what there may be left of them may be industrious and populate the State sufficiently to keep the number up, that it may not fall back.

Mr. KENYON. We will keep busy. The Senator need not worry about that.

Mr. LEA. I imagine that none of the people of Iowa who go to Wyoming go to swell the population of Sundance.

Mr. WARREN. I presume there are none there from Tennessee, but there are plenty from Iowa.

Mr. LEA. If there are any in Sundance from Iowa, then some others already there must have left.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I was really trying to make a serious speech, and did not anticipate that the charms of Sundance would consume so much time. I would just like a little of my time now, and then I will give up the floor.

My thought and suggestion, without intending to arouse the risibilities of anybody, was simply the one I have been trying to announce—that we practice economy somewhere else and not so much of it to the soldiers. Congress built magnificent office buildings here a few years ago at an expense, I understand, of over $6,000,000—enough money to have built a comfortable home for every Senator and Congressman, to have furnished it, and provided them with all the luxuries of life. Who talked economy then? I have not been able to find that anybody did, though every dollar that went into those things was a dollar, according to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] paid by those who can illy afford to bear the burden of taxation.

Mr. President, we certainly can economize on river and harbor appropriations. We can economize on many little things. I hesitate to refer to some matters that we might economize on, but as long as these matters are being suggested all around, I am going to advance the proposition that the Senate is not in a particularly good condition to preach this doctrine of economy as to the soldiers. There is sort of a moral estoppel at least.

I have introduced a bill here, which I know is sneered at and laughed at, to abolish certain things that are unwarranted extravagances. I can not understand why free senatorial barber shops should be carried on, or free bathrooms. I can not understand why such things as are set forth in the annual report of the Secretary of the Senate as paid out of public funds should be done. In that interesting document which I hold in my hand, on page 309, we find some such articles as dandruff cure, Evanola cream, and massage cream paid out of contingent fund of Senate. Every dollar put into dandruff cure is a dollar paid by some taxpayer. I can not understand why such articles as tar shampoo and listerine and Evanola cream should be paid for out of public funds. Every dollar put into tar shampoo and Evanola cream according to the philosophy of the Senator from Ohio is a dollar taken out of the taxpayer, and it is true. Nor can I understand why 12 pairs of white duck trousers for attendants in the bathrooms, as shown on page 447 of this interesting document, $24, should be paid out of public funds.

These are small things; some laugh at them and joke about them; but it does not lie in our mouths in these luxuriant surroundings, with these free things, that cost somebody money, to say that we must economize as to the soldiers. The people do not ask Congress to economize on pensions.

There was no trouble raising the money for the Spanish War. There has never been any trouble raising money for any legitimate purpose, and what a farce it is to put the objections to the Sherwood bill on the ground of economy.

The soldiers of this country are not in favor of the Smoot bill. It is not a just measure. They are in favor of the Sherwood bill. It is a just measure. I asked Gen. SHERWOOD as to his correspondence with the soldiers on this proposition and whether this bill was satisfactory to the soldiers of the country and if I might say on his authority that it was not, and he said, "Yes; the whole State departments of Michigan and Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic, have declared against the Smoot bill; Lansing, Mich., Post of G. A. R., 245 members, the second largest in Michigan, have unanimously declared that they prefer no legislation rather than to have the Smoot substitute, and a large minority of soldiers heard from prefer no legislation at all to the Smoot substitute."

That is the authority of Gen. SHERWOOD, who sits here at my side and who knows this soldier question. I would rather have his judgment on pension matters than that of any man in this country. If the Smoot bill was satisfactory to the soldier and was the best that could be done, I would raise no protest, but it is not satisfactory to the soldiers and it is not the best bill. The ideas of the soldiers ought to have some weight in getting at what is a fair bill. They are reasonable men who love their country fully as much as those legislating for them. They want no unreasonable things.

Under this bill the nearly 500,000 men who were mustered into the service in 1862 can never secure the maximum amount allowed.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KENYON. I will yield.

Mr. LEA. I desire to call attention to the report of the Department of Commerce and Labor, Bureau of the Census, E. Dana Durand, Director, on page 585, table 2, population of incorporated places. 1910, 1900, and 1890, Sundance town, Crook County: 1910, 281; 1900, 294; 1890, 515. Having shown by the census record the true population of Sundance I desire to make now the same observation which I understood the Senator from Wyoming to make a few minutes ago, that is the old adage, that a lie however innocently told travels far faster than the truth.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not wish to take time now——

Mr. KENYON. I would like to yield to the Senator, but, of course, we have had so much about Sundance—everything but its population.

Mr. WARREN. I shall place in the RECORD at the proper time the record of the Census Office exactly as it is printed in public documents, showing that my statement was correct and that any statement to the contrary is incorrect. I shall not now ask for further time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. KENYON. I was trying to say before this unfortunate interruption that of the nearly 500,000 men mustered in in August, 1862, and mustered out in the spring of 1865, none had three years service. Some of the greatest and most effective battles of that war were fought by those men. They were the men who stood at Franklin in the bloodiest battle of the war. Without them the hills of Resaca never would have been charged, or the two-days' battle before Atlanta fought. This bill will not permit a single one of those men to have the full maximum, nor will but few of the soldiers ever reach the age of 75 years with the three years' service and secure the maximum allowance. Gen. SHERWOOD has figured it at about two or three thousand. Mr. SULLOWAY, who is interested in this question on the other side of the Capitol, has figured some 6,000. The age is too high. The soldiers are passing away at the rate of 100 a day. The maximum amount will never do them very much good. Not many live to be over 75 years of age.

Mr. President, when I got up I wanted only to talk for four or five minutes, but interruptions have come and occupied my time. Gen. Dudley, at the time he was Commissioner of Pensions, said that every boy who went to the war at 16 years of age and spent three years there shortened his life by five years. This must be so; those years of hardship would shorten any life.

Mr. President, this Nation can afford to be just to everybody. It can not afford to be unjust. We are living in the age of a square deal—a square deal to everybody—and all I am asking is a square deal for the soldiers. The Nation is rich enough to be just to its soldiers. It is only a few years more, and they will be gone. They believe, I am satisfied, not only from what Gen. SHERWOOD says, but from the correspondence I have had, that the Sherwood bill is just; that the Sherwood bill is what they desire. Revenues can be raised to meet the additional expense; economy can assist.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there are a number of Senators who have indicated their desire to speak on this subject. Some of them thought they would speak this afternoon, but I presume on account of the sun-dance or ghost-dance debate we have had in the last half hour they have become disconcerted and would prefer to speak to-morrow. That being the case, I move that the Senate now take a recess until to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CLAPP. Will not the Senator make the hour 12, so as to be sure to get through to-morrow?

Mr. McCUMBER. There are many committees that meet in the forenoon, and they run on until after 1 o'clock. I think we will accomplish the same end if we meet at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. May I suggest to the Senator that he make the time a little before 2?

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well; I will say 1 o'clock and 45 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota moves that the Senate take a recess until 1.45 p. m. to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m. Thursday) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, at 1 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 28, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, who fillest the heavens with glory and the earth with goodness, humbly we bow in Thy presence and acknowledge our indebtedness to Thee for all things, temporal and spiritual. Enrich our minds with wisdom and knowledge from on high and fill our hearts with grace divine, that with all diligence and perseverance we may discharge the obligations resting upon us, private and public. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NATIONAL CONSERVATION EXPOSITION, KNOXVILLE, TENN.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent to publish in the RECORD a bill which I introduced, H. R. 22338, entitled "An act to provide for participation by the Government of the United States in the National Conservation Exposition to be held at Knoxville, Tenn., in the fall of 1913," and a statement in reference to said exposition.

Mr. SULZER. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] asks unanimous consent to print, in the RECORD, House bill 22338, a bill touching the conservation exposition to be held at Knoxville, Tenn., in the fall of 1913, together with a statement concerning the same. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill referred to is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Government of the United States participate in the National Conservation Exposition, to be held at Knoxville, Tenn., during the fall of 1913. That there shall be exhibited at said exposition from the executive departments of the United States such articles and materials as will illustrate the administrative functions of the Government and their educational value in connection with the development and wise use of the natural resources of the United States, especially the advancement of scientific agriculture and the increase of productivity of the soil through improved cultivation and crop selection and the prevention of avoidable wastes; the reclamation of wet and dry lands by drainage and irrigation, respectively; the more economical development and utilization of mineral wealth; the judicious use of and prevention of needless destruction in woodlands for maintaining timber supply and protecting headwaters of streams; the use and improvement of inland waterways; the preservation of fish and game; the preservation and protection of life in connection with industrial operations; and the economic investigations and operations of the Government with reference to mines and mining, geology, topographic and other surveys, public roads, experiment stations, rural life improvement, and public health and sanitation. That these subjects shall be presented in exhibits and in illustrated lectures by representatives of the Government. To secure a complete and harmonious arrangement of such Government exhibit a United States Government board of managers is hereby authorized to be appointed to be charged with the selection, purchase, preparation, transportation, arrangement, safe-keeping, exhibition, and return of such articles and materials as the heads of the several departments, respectively, decide shall be embraced in the Government exhibit herein authorized. The President of the United States may also designate additional articles of peculiar interest for exhibition in connection with the said Government exhibit. Said Government board of managers shall be composed of three persons now in the employ of the Government and shall be appointed by the President, one of whom shall be designated by the President as chairman of the said board and one as secretary and disbursing officer. The members of said Government board, with other officers and employees of the Government who may be detailed to assist them, including officers of the Army and Navy, shall receive no compensation in addition to their regular salaries, but they shall be allowed their actual and necessary traveling expenses, together with a per diem in lieu of subsistence, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, while necessarily absent from their homes engaged upon the business of the board. Officers of the Army and Navy shall receive said allowance in lieu of the subsistence and mileage now allowed by law; and the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy may, in their discretion, detail retired Army or Navy officers for such duty. Any provision of law which may prohibit the detail of persons in the employ of the United States to other service than that which they customarily perform shall not apply to persons detailed for duty in connection with said National Conservation Exposition. Employees of the board not otherwise employed by the Government shall be entitled to such compensation as the board may determine, and such employees may be selected and appointed by said board. The disbursing officer shall give bond in such sum as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine for the faithful performance of his duties, said bond to be approved by said Secretary. The Secretary of the Treasury shall advance to said officer from time to time, under such regulations as he may prescribe, a sum of money from the appropriation for the Government exhibit herein authorized, not exceeding at any one time three-fourths of the penalty of his bond, to enable him to pay the expenses of said exhibit as authorized by the United States Government board herein created. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to place on exhibition, in connection with the exhibit of his department, upon such grounds as shall be allotted for this purpose, one of the life-saving stations authorized to be constructed on the Atlantic coast of the United States by existing law, and to cause the same to be fully equipped with all apparatus, furniture, and appliances now in use in life-saving stations in the United States: Provided, That the cost of said exhibit herein authorized, including the selection, purchase, preparation, transportation, arrangement, safe-keeping, exhibition, and return of the articles and materials so exhibited, and the expenses and per diems of the officials and employees of the Government connected with the exhibit or assigned to deliver lectures, shall not exceed the sum of $200,000, which sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. That in aid of the said National Conservation Exposition the sum of $200,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which sum shall be paid to the National Conservation Exposition Co. upon satisfactory evidence being furnished the Secretary of the Treasury that the said company has raised a like sum on account of said exposition, in addition to any amount secured prior to February 1, 1912, and exclusive of all appropriations from State legislatures. Said $200,000 shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury upon vouchers and satisfactory evidence that it has been expended for the purposes of the exposition other than salaries.

SEC. 3. That all articles that shall be imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at the National Conservation Exposition, to be held at Knoxville, Tenn., in the year 1913, upon which there shall be a tariff or customs duty shall be admitted free of the payment of duty, customs fees, or charges, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but it shall be lawful at any time during the exposition to sell for delivery at the close thereof any goods or property imported for and actually on exhibition in the exposition buildings or on the grounds, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and for the collection of import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That all such articles when sold or withdrawn for consumption or use in the United States shall be subject to the duty, if any, imposed upon such articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of withdrawal; and on such articles which shall have suffered diminution or deterioration from incidental handling and necessary exposure the duty, if paid, shall be assessed according to the appraised value at the time of withdrawal for consumption or use, and the penalties prescribed by law shall be enforced against any person guilty of any illegal sale, use, or withdrawal.

SEC. 4. That medals with appropriate devices, emblems, and inscriptions commemorative of said National Conservation Exposition, and of the awards to be made to the exhibitors thereat, shall be prepared for the National Conservation Exposition Co. by the Secretary of the Treasury at some mint of the United States, subject to the provisions of the fifty-second section of the coinage act of 1893, upon the payment by the National Conservation Exposition of a sum equal to the cost thereof; and authority may be given by the Secretary of the Treasury to the holder of a medal properly awarded to him to have duplicates thereof made at any of the mints of the United States from gold, silver, or bronze, upon the payment by him for the same of a sum equal to the cost thereof.

SEC. 5. That the United States shall not be liable on account of said exposition for any expenses incident to or growing out of the same, except for the purpose of paying the expense incident to the selection, preparation, purchase, installation, transportation, care, custody, and safe return of the exhibits made by the Government, and for the employment of proper persons as officers and assistants by the Government board created by this act, and for other expenses to be approved by the chairman of the Government board, or, in the event of his absence or disability, by such officer as the board may designate, and the Secretary of the Treasury, upon itemized accounts and vouchers: Provided, That no liability against the Government shall be incurred and no expenditures of money appropriated by this act shall be made until provision shall be made by the National Conservation Exposition Co. to the satisfaction of the Government board of managers herein established for a suitable building for the Government exhibits and lectures herein authorized.

SEC. 6. That the United States shall not in any manner or under any circumstances be liable for any of the acts, doings, or representations of said National Conservation Exposition Co. (a corporation), its officers, agents, servants, or employees, or any of them, or for service, salaries, labor, or wages of said officers, agents, servants, or employees, or any of them, or for any subscriptions to the capital stock, or for any stock certificates, bonds, mortgages, or obligations of any kind issued by said corporation, or for any debts, liabilities, or expenses of any kind or nature whatever attending such exposition corporation or accruing by reason of the same.

SEC. 7. That nothing in this act shall be construed so as to create any liability upon the part of the United States, directly or indirectly, for any debt or obligation incurred or for any claim for aid or pecuniary assistance from Congress or the Treasury of the United States in support or liquidation of any debts or obligations created by said United States Government board in excess of appropriations herein made.

SEC. 8. That the United States shall not in any manner or under any circumstances make any loan, directly or indirectly, to the National Conservation Exposition Co., or for the benefit of said exposition, or for any of the purposes thereof, and shall not appropriate for any purpose whatsoever in connection with said exposition any sum of money other than that provided in this act.

THE NATIONAL CONSERVATION EXPOSITION AT KNOXVILLE, TENN.

Mr. AUSTIN. The National Conservation Exposition, awarded to Knoxville, Tenn., by the national advisory board of the exposition at Washington, will be held in that city during the fall of 1913, from September 1 to October 31. The exposition company has been organized and drafts have been made for a charter with a capital stock of $1,000,000. New capital has been subscribed and a number of new exposition buildings, to range in cost from $25,000 to $250,000, are to be erected. In addition, the company takes over the present plant and all property of the Appalachian Exposition Co., valued at $1,000,000, and which could not be duplicated for that amount of money.

The officers of the National Conservation Exposition Co. are as follows: President, William S. Shields, president of the City National Bank; first vice president, J. Allen Smith, president of the Knoxville City Mills Co.; second vice president, Don Carlos Ellis, in charge of public education, United States Forest Service; third vice president, George W. Callahan, president of the Callahan Construction Co.; fourth vice president, Hu. M. Johnston, president of the Union Bank; treasurer, S. V. Carter, cashier East Tennessee National Bank; and general manager, W. M. Goodman, secretary Commercial Club.

The advisory board of the National Conservation Exposition is constituted as follows: Gifford Pinchot, president of the National Conservation Association, chairman; D. C. Ellis, in charge of public education, United States Forest Service, secretary; Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, of Florida, president of the Southern Commercial Congress; P. P. Claxton, United States Commissioner of Education; W J McGee, soil-water expert, United States Department of Agriculture; Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, president of the United States pharmacopœial convention; Logan W. Page, Director United States Office of Public Roads; Bradford Knapp, in charge of farmers' cooperative demonstration work, United States Department of Agriculture; J. A. Holmes, Director Bureau of Mines; Representative JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, of Louisiana, president of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress; and Senator LUKE LEA, of Tennessee.

The exposition, national in scope, will be helpful to those who are promoting irrigation and dry farming in the West, as well as to those who are interested in the reclamation of swamp lands in the far South. It will be recognized as a great agency for the uplift and development of the whole country, and consequently as an aid to the special work of each city and section of the United States. It will promote the conservation of forests, soils, minerals, waterways, fish and game, and human efficiency, and the rapid and permanent development of all sources of wealth.

Knoxville, Tenn., the center of a region which possesses a greater variety of mineral, timber, and agricultural wealth than any area of like extent in the United States, is a most excellent location for the exposition.

The beautiful park and buildings of the Appalachian exposition have been turned over to the National Conservation Exposition, and these will form the nucleus around which the larger affair will be built.

A Southern States building is designed as a novel feature, the idea being to show the resources and manufacturing industries of 16 Southern States under one roof.

Plans have been made for the erection of an agricultural and land building, in which there will be a relief map of the Southeast, built up of soils of the various States, showing mountains, timber regions, stream with actual running water, the railroads, Atlantic and Gulf ports, and the cities.

THE GROWTH OF THE EXPOSITION IDEA.

During the later half of the nineteenth century America's industrial advancement outran all precedent or parallel. The abounding natural resources in timber, coal, iron, and other materials were made known by State surveys and other means, and were exploited lavishly; manufacturing, railway building, and other industries were pushed energetically; foundations were laid for vast fortunes; millionaires and multimillionaires came up, and through growing trade and larger wages than were paid in other countries money abounded, and per capita wealth rose above all earlier or contemporary standards. During the later half of this era of expansion the exposition idea—borrowed from Europe—took root, and from the Centennial Exposition of 1876 to the Universal Exposition of 1904 flourished exuberantly. The great series of national and international expositions, beginning in Philadelphia and ending in St. Louis, were designed to display and did display effectively the greatness of the natural wealth of the country and the marvelous industrial growth brought about through utilization of this natural wealth. Taken together, the expositions rang out an anthem of national inheritance and national achievement, sounded a pean of national glory, such as the world had not heard before. Each was a record of conquest over nature wrought by human genius, each a mile mark of further progress, each a summation of material enrichment of its date.

A NEW EXPOSITION IDEA.

During the first decade of the twentieth century a new realization of the value and importance of the natural resources took shape. Through scientific surveys by States and the Federal Government, designed primarily to make the resources known and guide their exploitation, the quantities of standing timber, of iron ore and coal in the ground, and of other natural materials were measured; and the quantities were found not unlimited, according to the common boast in the heyday of early exploitation, but of such amounts as to meet current demands for only a certain number of years, easily reckoned and understood in terms of the written history of mankind—for example, at the current increasing rate of use computed in 1908 the standing timber of the country would last a generation, the high-grade iron ore a century, and the good coal from one to three centuries, according to the varying allowances made by different computers. In short, it became clear that the standard resources on which our great and growing industries rest are foredoomed to exhaustion within a small fraction of the period already covered by the Christian era, unless means be adopted to prevent waste and otherwise conserve the natural stores for the benefit of posterity. As understanding of the limitation of the natural resources spread, moral sense was awakened; the feeling of the natural right of the rising generation (and of generations still to come) to a fair share of the resources took form; and the natural wealth of this magnificently endowed country came to be viewed as involving moral no less than material considerations. Numberless manifestations of the new view have appeared—in legal enactments, the creation of State commissions, the improvement of educational curricula, and so forth—but no more striking indication of the modern view has appeared than the idea of national expositions designed to illustrate the conservation and development of the natural resources with a view to the permanent enrichment of the country and people. The change thus wrought in the exposition idea is fundamental; the old exposition looked backward, the new looks forward; the old exposition was solely material, the new is essentially moral; the old was a proud boast of achievement, the new a signpost to progress and an assurance of perpetuity. The expositions of the past were as songs of achievement at the end of a good day's work, the new may well be as living and tangible promises of a still more glorious to-morrow foreordained by the wise action of to-day.

THE KNOXVILLE EXPOSITION.

The National Conservation Exposition at Knoxville (1913) is planned in accordance with exposition history, especially to illustrate the modern idea of forecasting prospective development, especially throughout the Southern States. In a broad way the design is to illustrate the ways in which the natural wealth in forests, lands, waters, minerals, and human efficiency are now used and may be still more effectively utilized in promoting the prosperity and assuring the perpetuity of the American people.

THE RESOURCES IN LANDS.

Recognizing the soil made fruitful by the natural water supply as that resource on which, more than all others, the generations of men must depend for materials for food and clothing, it is planned to devote large space to the exhibits of the soil and its products, of the best methods of maintaining and increasing production, and of progress in improving the grade and yield of plant and animal products.

The soils of the country in general, and of the South in particular, will be exhibited (1) by samples so arranged as to illustrate types and capabilities; (2) by maps, diagrams, and printed matter indicating distribution and uses; (3) by methods of tillage best adapted to particular soil types and climates, shown on small scale by object lessons and by farm machinery, as well as photographs and other illustrations; (4) by examples of drainage, irrigating, and other modes of treatment designed to improve the soil and enhance its productivity; (5) by devices for fertilizing through use of natural by-products and through chemicals, and so forth; and (6) by examples and descriptive literature of crop rotation and other constructive methods. A special exhibit is also contemplated to illustrate the impoverishment of soils through destructive erosion, leaching, and so forth, under negligent farming, with the most improved methods and devices for preventing these evils by (a) improved tillage, (b) terracing, (c) timber planting, and so forth.

The plant crops will be exhibited with special reference to new varieties, both improved and introduced, (1) so far as practicable, by specimens in actual cultivation and growth; (2) by typical and exceptionally fine products; (3) by methods of cultivating, harvesting, and treating, illustrated by means of photographs and otherwise; and (4) by displaying methods of reduction of manufacture into the finished form for consumption for food, clothing, or other purposes.

An important object of the display will be to illustrate the availability of unknown or little-used crop plants for increasing the income yield of farms beyond that practicable with such staples as corn and cotton; another object will be to illustrate every stage in the process of growth and manufacture of typical crops in such manner that growers, manufacturers, and consumers may better adjust and coordinate their respective functions and short-cut processes not needlessly long or devious. Special displays will also be made of successful methods of multiplying production per acre, as has recently been illustrated by corn clubs, tomato clubs, and so forth.

Animal crops will be exhibited (1) by living groups of domestic animals, poultry, and so forth, illustrating the most approved methods of care, feeding, and sheltering; (2) by typical and fine specimens of both ordinary and introduced stock; and (3) by illustrating processes of handling and manufacturing animal products and converting them into the finished commodities of food and clothing. Special attention will be given to illustrating (a) the best balance between plant and animal production to yield the maximum income and preserve the fertility of the soil; (b) the advantage of increasing food production through dairying, poultry raising, and so forth; and in general (c) the expediency of rendering each farm a sort of vital laboratory in which the products are raised to the highest practicable value before marketing—this with the double object of inculcating thrift and increasing the opportunity and demand for the highest intelligence on the farm.

FOREST RESOURCES.

Our forest resources are second in importance only to the land itself, because of the many important industries for which the forest furnishes raw material, and of the forest's beneficent influences upon such other natural riches as waters for irrigation, power, and navigation, fish and game animals, and the land itself. Considerable attention is to be devoted to forest exhibits.

It is planned to illustrate the existing forest resources with their production and reproduction, their utilization, and their influences upon other resources.

The existing resources will be displayed by maps, models, diagrams, charts, pictures, tree sections, samples of woods, and other specimens.

The production and reproduction of forests will be exhibited in such ways as will contrast the wasteful methods of nature with the scientific methods followed by the forester. The exhibits will show forest destruction by fire, insects, grazing stock, and other natural agencies and the methods for preventing such destruction in this country and abroad; the place of the wood lot upon the farm, the scientific management of woodlands, the administration of the national forest, and planting and sowing natural forest land.

The utilization of the forests will be illustrated (1) by their products, the actual products being preferred to representations of them; (2) by methods used in production, so arranged as to contrast wasteful, unscientific methods with economical, scientific methods. In lumbering, for example, exhibits will be used to encourage the full utilization of all valuable material in the woods and the protection of young growth.

The most economical methods of manufacture will be shown; for example, the advantage of the band saw over the circular saw, of riving (for handle stock, and so forth), and veneer cutting, the utilization of short and odd lengths of lumber, the building up of beams, the manufacture of by-products, and the correlation of industries to reduce waste. Other exhibits will be employed to promote the utilization of substitutes of less valuable for more valuable and scarcer woods and the preservative treatment of certain classes of timbers.

The influences of the forest upon (1) surface conditions—preventing erosion of slopes and of the covering of alluvial bottoms; (2) stream flow for power, navigation, and irrigation, the lessening of the duration and intensity of floods and droughts, and of the setting up of storage reservoirs and channels of navigable streams; (3) the fixation of shifting sands; (4) climate and health; (5) fish and game animals will be set forth appropriately.

WATER RESOURCES.

The water resources of the country in general and of the South in particular will be displayed with reference to the use of water (a) for domestic supply, (b) for agricultural production, whether applied by natural means or by irrigation; (c) for power; and (d) for navigation.

The acquisition, control, and use of water for domestic supply will be illustrated (1) by representations of wells, cisterns, and springs, showing danger of contamination and means of preventing it; (2) by pumping and other devices for furnishing, distributing, and purifying water for domestic and community use; (3) by maps and statistics showing the natural distribution of water and the modification of the natural supply attending settlement and cultivation; and (4) exhibits showing the rôle of water among foods, with the consumption of artificial liquids, and so forth, as affecting both water supply and the public health.

The agricultural use of water will be illustrated (1) by actual examples on the exposition grounds, (2) by diagrams and statistics, (3) by methods of and devices for drainage or other means of controlling soil water, and (4) by devices for irrigation, and so forth. A special effort will be made through the combination of exhibits to bring home to every visitor the realization that floods may be prevented, destructive soil erosion may be avoided, and productivity may be greatly increased by such control of the natural water supply through tillage and crop selection that each farm will take care of all the water falling on it.

The development and utilization of water power will be illustrated (1) by model dams, conduits, and water engines, (2) by maps and statistics showing the distribution of water available for power, especially throughout southeastern United States, (3) by devices for electric and other conversion and transmission of water power, and (4) by diagrams and statistics.

The use of water for navigation will be illustrated by appropriate devices, supplemented by maps and statistical information, showing how the cost of transportation may be reduced by use of natural and artificial waterways.

MINERAL RESOURCES.

The mineral resources of the country as a whole, and especially of southeastern United States, will be exhibited as the chief basis for the greatness of this country in manufacturing and as a means of maintaining our industrial supremacy.

Our natural wealth in coal and the means of best utilizing it will be illustrated (1) by specimens showing thickness and character of veins, and so forth; (2) by maps, diagrams, and statistical information showing the extent and quantity of coal remaining in the ground; (3) by objective illustrations of methods of coal mining, showing ways in which waste of coal and other losses, including loss of life, may be reduced; (4) devices for the manufacture of coke, briquets, and other coal products; (5) furnaces, gasifiers, and improved gas and steam engines, illustrating improvements in combustion and the utilization of the largest practicable fraction of the thermal energy of the coal; and (6) representations of the uses of coal in smelting and other industrial processes.

Our wealth in iron will be illustrated (1) by specimens of ore and of manufactured products, including by-products, (2) by maps and statistics, and (3) by devices for and methods of working. Special attention will be given also to illustrations of the waste and destruction of manufactured iron by needless oxidation, electrolysis, and so forth, and to means of reworking iron and steel scrap; also to substitutes for iron, especially in construction, and to the wastes or losses in the mining treatment and utilization of other mineral and metal products and methods of preventing these wastes.

Petroleum, peat, and natural gas will be illustrated as mineral fuels, supplementing our natural supply of coal, while copper, zinc, lead, and other metallic minerals will be exhibited by specimens and otherwise in a manner corresponding to the display of iron.

Special attention will be given to the display of materials for construction available as substitutes for iron, especially (a) cement and concrete (both massive and reenforced), (b) fire clay, (c) brick material, and so forth; for it is realized that this is the dawn of a new era in construction in which materials at once available in vast quantities and indestructible by fire or other accident must be substituted for wood and expensive metal in the construction of domiciles, shops, factories, and other structures, especially in cities and towns.

HUMAN EFFICIENCY.

HEALTH.

By far the most important of all of our natural resources is man himself. It is to render his life more efficient that any form of conservation is advocated. Those vital forces intimate to himself are highest and noblest, and to their development, conservation, and best use deep thought and great effort should be devoted.

The abolition of child labor, particularly in the Southern States, the reduction of infant mortality, the eradication of disease, especially tuberculosis, the hookworm, and typhoid fever, will be graphically presented.

The protection of the milk and water supplies of our cities, the extermination of the fly and the mosquito, and the elimination from commerce of impure, adulterated foods and drugs will be presented in appropriate form as essential prerequisites of public health. There shall also be presented exhibits which will promote the protection of human life in mines, the shortening of hours of labor for women in factories, and other most desirable industrial reforms.

EDUCATION.

Another most important element in human development is education. The school is a crucial problem in the commercial upbuilding of the Southern States. School hygiene and sanitation, domestic economy, vocational training, industrial education for the negro, and rural school advancement shall be subjects for exhibition and shall be presented in the form of model demonstrations and in other ways.

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

So important is this subject considered as an element in greater human efficiency that, though it might properly be included as part of another section, it is thought well to devote a separate paragraph to it. Home making is the first and most important step in nation making. The work of the wife and mother in the establishment and maintenance of a comfortable home, in the preparing of proper food, and by her wisdom and domestic labors in the creation and radiation of domestic tranquillity and happiness can contribute at least as much to the prosperity of the Nation and the efficiency of its citizens as can the husband and the father by his efforts in the outside world. The advancement of domestic science shall be encouraged, first, by exhibits in the form of (a) a model small dwelling properly furnished and cared for, (b) labor-saving devices in the homes, (c) demonstration meals publicly prepared and served by the domestic-science classes of high schools and university, (d) demonstrations of meat cuts, (e) demonstration of proper methods in marketing, (f) samples in domestic bookkeeping, (g) lectures on domestic science.

GOOD ROADS.

Good roads are necessary requisites to development. Exhibits will be made of good roads in the form of (1) actual demonstration roads, (2) models showing materials, manner of construction, and the finished work, (3) road-making materials and machinery, (4) maps of important highways, (5) photographic enlargements of both good and bad roads and the consequences and industrial and social conditions attending each.

FISH AND GAME RESOURCES.

The cooperation of Audubon societies, fish and game commissions, and other organizations for the preservation of bird and animal life will be sought in exhibiting our animal resources and encouraging their perpetuation.

PRESERVATION OF NIAGARA FALLS.
